

Managing transitions in care within and across services

Transitions take place when a child or young person moves from one service pathway to another, when an episode of care comes to an end, or when they reach an age cut-off for a service. A poorly managed transfer of care can result in a child or young person losing contact with the services or support they need, making it critical that transitions are organised appropriately.

Competences outlined in this document overlap with those set out in the sections detailing competences relating to:

‘Ability to operate within and across organisations’

‘Knowledge of, and ability to work with, issues of confidentiality and consent’

Knowledge relevant to transitions in care

An ability to draw on knowledge that transitions in care (within and across organisations) can be potentially destabilising and so represent times of greater risk of self-harm and/or suicide an ability to draw on knowledge that anticipating the ending of treatment, services or relationships, as well as transitions from one service to another, can provoke strong feelings and so increase the risk of self-harm or suicide an ability to draw on knowledge that where transfers in care are prompted by services feeling unable to manage the emergence of self-harm or suicidal ideation or behaviour, the transition between services represents a period of potentially increased risk that needs to be managed

Identifying transitions in care within and across organisations

An ability to identify transfers of care that may represent points of greater risk, such as:

transfers within an organisation (e.g. from one professional to another within a service) transfers across organisations (e.g. from inpatient care to the community, or from health care to social care) transfers from services for young people to adult services transfers from the health and social care system to the forensic or criminal justice system unexpected transitions (e.g. resulting from a change in address or the departure of a key worker) planned transitions (e.g. a worker taking annual leave)

Knowledge about the transfer

An ability to draw on up-to-date knowledge of the services to which a transfer is being considered, using this information to ensure that the proposed transfer is:

appropriate to a child’s or young person’s needs can be offered within an appropriate timescale

Helping a child or young person prepare for a transfer of care

An ability to advise a child or young person of the proposed transfer, ensuring that they:	are given as much notice as is practically possible understand the rationale for a transfer of care are informed about the services that will be on offer are informed about the likely timescale of the transfer know what information will (and won't) be communicated to the new professional and/or service, and can discuss any concerns an ability to balance considerations of confidentiality against the risk of harm to a child or young person and to judge when it is their best interest to share information An ability to discuss a child's or young person's feelings about the transfer and to work with them to:
	identify barriers that make it less likely that they will maintain contact with the new service (e.g. anxiety or anger about starting afresh, upset over loss of contact with valued professionals) discuss their concerns and feelings identify issues that will make a transfer of care problematic (and so signal a potential increase in risk)
Where families or carers have been providing significant support, an ability to consider what information it is appropriate to share with them about the transfer

Transfer of care

An ability to draw on knowledge that young people may require additional support and preparation to successfully navigate transfers of care, for example in the form of:
	ensuring that the service to which they are referred is suited to their developmental stage and capacities maintaining involvement with their family or carers (if this is something that the young person sees as helpful) where possible, a joint hand over appointment
An ability to draw on knowledge of the increased vulnerability of young people who are experiencing multiple synchronous transitions (e.g. from school to college, changes in living arrangements and transfer across clinical services)
Where there are indications that transfers of care will present significant challenges to the young person, an ability to implement appropriate strategies, such as:
	identifying a named individual who can maintain continuity of support during the transition where appropriate helping the young person to develop skills in independence, assertiveness and self-advocacy An ability to draw on knowledge that families and carers may find transfers of care a challenge, for example by:
	feeling excluded as the young person takes more ownership of their care feeling excluded where adult services do not routinely involve families and carers

Communication within and between services to which a child or young person is being transferred

An ability to assure effective communication with professionals within and between services by providing written communication that identifies:

the relevant clinical issues, the current care plan and the reasons for concerns about risk the rationale for referral (i.e. the areas for which help is sought and the services which it is hoped the service or other professionals will offer) expectations regarding feedback from the service (e.g. confirming receipt and advising on the actions taken)

Recognising and managing challenges to transfers of care

An ability to monitor the progress of a transfer

An ability to identify when a transfer has been compromised and to identify the reasons for this, for example:

institutional/systemic factors (such as long waiting lists or organisational change) lack of cooperation or trust between professionals (especially where this reflects the 'legacy' of previous contacts, or a lack of understanding of what has been requested) lack of clarity about who is responsible for acting on a transfer request (leading to a failure to act)

An ability to address concerns about a compromised transfer, for example, through further verbal and/or written communication

Where possible and appropriate, an ability to offer bridging support and contact if this increases the probability that a child or young person will engage with the new service
