The Devolution Monitoring Programme

From 1999 to 2005 the Constitution Unit at University College London managed a major research project monitoring devolution across the UK through a network of research teams. 103 reports were produced during this project, which was funded by the Economic and Social Research Council (grant number L 219 252 016) and the Leverhulme Nations and Regions Programme. Now, with further funding from the Economic and social research council and support from several government departments, the monitoring programme is continuing for a further three years from 2006 until the end of 2008.

Three times per year, the research network produces detailed reports covering developments in devolution in five areas: Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland, the English Regions, and Devolution and the Centre. The overall monitoring project is managed by Professor Robert Hazell at The Constitution Unit, UCL and the team leaders are as follows:

- Scotland: Dr Paul Cairney
University of Aberdeen
- Wales: Prof Richard Wyn Jones & Prof Roger Scully
Institute of Welsh Politics, Aberystwyth University
- Northern Ireland: Professor Rick Wilford & Robin Wilson
Queen's University, Belfast
- English Regions: Prof Alan Harding & Dr James Rees
IPEG, University of Manchester
- The Centre: Prof Robert Hazell, The Constitution Unit, UCL

The Constitution Unit and the rest of the research network is grateful to all the funders of the devolution monitoring programme.

1. Monitoring the Union

As the global economic climate has continued to worsen, the governments of the United Kingdom have increasingly had to work together to solve shared economic problems. The economic crisis was discussed at the British Irish Council, and has seen close cooperation between the UK and Welsh Assembly governments (see section 6).

Inter-governmental co-operation has also been apparent on the passage of legislation. Welsh and UK institutions have continued to work together to progress further Legislative Competence Orders (LCOs) and in November 2008 the Scottish Parliament passed another Legislative Consent Motion (LCM) in relation to the UK Energy Act. The Queen's Speech contained a range of legislation with applicability in the devolved regions, suggesting that the relationship between the devolved administrations and the centre is going to continue to be lively over the course of the upcoming year. Much of the legislation will require the consent of the devolved assemblies and much of the remainder will at least need the co-operation of the devolved administrations in order to work effectively.

Devolution finance remains an issue of growing importance. The interim report of the Calman Commission on the Future of Scottish Devolution published in December 2008 devoted a detailed chapter to the financial accountability of the Scottish Parliament, and has undertaken to identify different combinations of funding mechanisms in the next stage of its work. In Wales the Independent Commission on Funding and Finance was launched in October, and its chair Gerry Holtham has promised a first report by summer 2009. Meanwhile at Westminster the House of Lords has established an ad hoc Select Committee to examine the effectiveness of the Barnett formula and consider alternative mechanisms: the committee first met on 17 December.

Northern Ireland saw two major developments take place which are likely to have long-lasting repercussions. Firstly, after months of deadlock, an agreement has been reached between the DUP and Sinn Féin on the process to devolve policing and criminal justice powers to Northern Ireland and to start holding meetings of the Northern Ireland Executive again. The second development is that the Conservative and Ulster Unionist parties have reached an election pact whereby they will put up joint candidates in General and European elections. Both of these events would appear to suggest a continuing normalisation of politics in Northern Ireland. The DUP-Sinn Féin agreement on devolution would appear to reaffirm the belief that politics can work in Northern Ireland without the need for violence; while the introduction of a mainstream UK party offers Northern Ireland the opportunity for political choices beyond the unionist-nationalist divide.

After strong opposition from the Conservatives, the government narrowly gained approval for its plans to create new regional committees for England. The House of Commons voted on 12 November to create eight regional select committees and eight regional grand committees, one for every region except London. The regional committees are intended to ensure greater scrutiny and democratic accountability of regional strategies and bodies, including the new Regional Ministers created by Gordon Brown in summer 2007. The Conservatives are critical of the waste of money involved, and are opposed to the creation of any new regional structures.

2. Political Parties

2.1 Labour

Iain Gray MSP was elected leader of the Scottish Labour Party in September, and benefited from the improvement in the Labour Party's fortunes towards the end of 2008. In Scotland the party successfully held onto the Glenrothes UK Parliament constituency in a byelection on 6 November. Glenrothes is a traditional Labour stronghold but the SNP held the equivalent Scottish Parliament seat and ran the local council, so following the SNP win in Glasgow East back in July it was widely expected that they would take the seat from Labour.¹ Turnout was down, but the Labour Party's vote went up by 3.2 per cent and the SNP's by 13.1 per cent.² During the campaign the Labour Party focused its attacks upon the SNP's record in government. The SNP's failure to win the seat may well indicate that public support is gradually shifting away from the SNP,³ something which recent polling in Scotland seems to suggest.^{4 5}

2.2 Conservatives

The long history of Conservative-UUP relations started a new chapter in November when the two parties agreed a pact to run joint party candidates in general and European elections.⁶ Prior to the Sunningdale Agreement, UUP MPs used to follow the Conservative whip but that agreement came to an end and the relationship had never been so advanced that the MPs held joint party membership – with all the rights and responsibilities that entails.

Both parties have been keen to emphasise the benefits of the new arrangement for Northern Irish voters: giving voters in Northern Ireland the opportunity to have a greater say in UK and international politics.^{7 8} In his speech to the UUP Conference David Cameron highlighted the importance of the agreement to a future Conservative cabinet, with UUP MPs being given the opportunity to join a UK-wide government and letting the Conservative Party draw upon the talents of Northern Irish politicians when forming a government.⁹ Mr Cameron said that he had 'selfish and strategic interests' in being involved in Northern Ireland.¹⁰

While the Conservative leader downplayed the potential electoral benefits of the agreement, such benefits could be significant to the parties. At the last general election Northern Ireland elected 18 MPs and at the last European election it elected three MEPs; only one of each was a UUP candidate. However polls suggest potential support for the Conservative Party in Northern Ireland (Devolution and the Centre DMR, September 2008). These extra seats could end up being pivotal to the Tories in the next election. Yet while working with the UUP might avoid competing with them for right-wing votes, it is hard to determine what the impact of working with a sectarian party will be at the polls. It might alienate potential voters who were looking for a non-sectarian option. It also puts the Conservatives into direct competition with other Northern Irish parties, some of whom the Conservatives might be dependent upon in the case of a hung parliament.

One benefit for the Conservative Party is that they can now claim to be the only major party to run in every part of the UK, a move which it would be difficult for the Labour Party to follow. The Social Democratic and Labour Party (SDLP) currently follow the Labour whip and sit on the same benches, however the SDLP is nationalist and the Labour Party is unionist so it is hard to conceive of a situation in which the parties would put up shared candidates. It is also unlikely that the Labour Party would risk sacrificing the support of the SDLP and splitting the left-wing vote in Northern Ireland by running their own candidates.

A similar concern might exist for the Conservative Party. The DUP, as the most electorally successful unionist party at present, has voiced their concern that the Conservatives could split the unionist vote in some constituencies, leading to the election of nationalist candidates,¹¹ whereas the UUP might well find that, by organising alongside the dominant right-wing party of UK politics, they end up losing support amongst left-leaning unionist voters and even members of their own party.¹² Indeed the party's only MP, Lady Sylvia Hermon, has often voted with Labour in Parliament and Cameron suggested in his speech that she does not support the UUP's working with the Conservatives.¹³

One potentially major change is that, despite the fact that the Conservatives are self-proclaimed unionists, by formally attaching themselves to a sectarian party they may well have lost their 'neutrality' on the question of Northern Ireland's future. When the Conservative Government declared in 1990 that they had no 'selfish strategic or economic interest' in Northern Ireland they adopted a position of neutrality which encouraged the nationalists to take peace negotiations seriously.¹⁴ David Cameron's declaration of his 'selfish and strategic interests' in the country eighteen years later risks estranging nationalists and, if he were to be elected, could prevent the Government from acting effectively to resolve future sectarian conflict.

2.3 Liberal Democrats

Kirsty Williams, AM (Assembly Member) for Brecon and Radnorshire, has been elected to replace Mike German as leader of the Welsh Liberal Democrats. She beat Jenny Randerson, AM for Cardiff Central, 59.9 per cent to 40.1 per cent on a 68.1 per cent turnout, becoming the first woman to lead any of the Welsh parties (and by far the youngest of the current leaders).¹⁵ The Liberal Democrats have a federal party structure, so the leader of the Welsh Liberal Democrats has a considerable amount of lee-way in running the party. As yet it is unclear what direction Kirsty Williams is likely to take. During the election she spoke frequently of her desire to create a more liberal Wales but with little elaboration on what this means or how she will go about it. Her main challenge will be to increase the representation of the Welsh Liberal Democrats in the Assembly beyond the six seats they have won in every election so far.

3. Devolution and Whitehall

3.1 HM Treasury

The Pre-Budget Report set out a range of measures the Government would use to help stimulate the UK economy. In the report the Government unveiled a fiscal stimulus package worth £20 billion, including moving £3 billion worth of public expenditure forward from 2010-11 to be spent in the upcoming year. Such measures will affect the economy of every region of the UK.¹⁶ The Scottish Government will be allowed to reallocate £260 million of capital spending, the Northern Ireland Executive will be able to do the same with £86 million as will the Welsh Assembly Government with £140 million.¹⁷ Since the block grant for each administration is calculated as a proportion of equivalent English expenditure, the increases in government spending announced as part of the package will lead to a rise in the block grant for each of the devolved administrations.

The mechanism for determining the block grants allocated to each devolved government, the Barnett formula, is now under review in Parliament. Following a long campaign by Lord Barnett, the House of Lords approved an ad hoc committee to assess the effectiveness of the Barnett formula and to investigate possible alternatives, and the new Committee was appointed and held its first meeting in December. The new Committee is due to report by the 2009 Summer Recess.¹⁸ Its chair is Lord Richard, with two former Scottish Secretaries (Lord Forsyth and Lord Lang), Lord Trimble (former First Minister of Northern Ireland) and Lord Lawson (former Chancellor of the Exchequer) amongst its members.

In December the Calman Commission published its First Report.¹⁹ The Commission was established by the Scottish Parliament (at the instance of the opposition parties who have a majority there), and the UK government. It reports to both, and is supported by a secretariat provided by the Scottish Parliament and UK government. Its remit is to consider the future of Scottish devolution within the Union, looking in particular at the balance of functions between the Scottish and UK Parliaments; the financial accountability of the Scottish Parliament; and ways in which the Scottish and UK institutions work together.

The First Report is a detailed analysis, running to 116 pages. In the chapter on powers and functions, the Commission identified the following as ones where substantial evidence had been received making a case for further devolution: broadcasting; energy policy; animal health and movement; firearms; misuse of drugs; regulation of health care professionals; and marine planning. They also published a second list of functions which were candidates for further change, but where sufficient evidence had not yet been received: the civil service; insolvency; employment law and relevant aspects of immigration; and health and safety.

On financial accountability, the Commission was assisted by an Independent Expert Group of economists and others, whose conclusions are appended to their report. They were advised that the present system of funding had got the Scottish Parliament off to a good start, but was weak in terms of accountability. Any system of funding requires trade offs between equity, efficiency and accountability. The choice between these conflicting principles must be determined not by technical considerations, but by the constitutional objectives that the funding system is designed to support. In the next phase of its work the Commission hopes to identify possible combinations of funding mechanisms, but in accordance with its own logic, must first identify the constitutional objectives which those funding mechanisms are designed to support.

The Commission was critical of the informality of intergovernmental relations between the Scottish Executive and UK government, and felt that in future it would be necessary to use more formal mechanisms for discussion and dispute resolution. It also linked this issue to the division of powers and functions: with more effective processes for resolving disputes, it might be possible to have more overlapping or concurrent executive responsibilities.

3.2 Scotland Office

In September David Cairns MP resigned as Minister of State at the Scotland Office, believing that the Labour party should allow a challenge to Gordon Brown's leadership. With Des Browne giving priority to his job as Defence Secretary, David Cairns had played an important role in the Scotland Office. He was replaced by Anne McKeekin MP, who was appointed Parliamentary Secretary in the Scotland Office.

In the October Cabinet reshuffle Des Browne lost his jobs as Defence Secretary and Secretary of State for Scotland. He was succeeded as Scottish Secretary by Jim Murphy, MP for East Renfrewshire. Jim Murphy was briefly PPS to Helen Liddell when she was Scottish Secretary in 2001. After serving in the Whips' Office from 2002 to 2005, he became Parliamentary Secretary in the Cabinet Office in 2005-06, Minister of State for Employment in 2006-07, and Minister for Europe in 2007-08. This is his first time in the Cabinet, and the Scotland Office once again has a full-time Secretary of State.

With the deepening economic crisis, the Scotland Office has had to work hard as a go-between for the UK and Scottish governments, helping to co-ordinate the responses of the two bodies to the problems facing Scotland's economy. In undertaking this role the Secretary of State has held meetings on the economic situation with a wide range of persons, including Geir Haarde, the Icelandic Prime Minister, to discuss Scottish deposits in Icelandic banks.²⁰

The Scotland Office has been supporting the Calman Commission and provided the Commission with the UK Government's evidence on Scottish devolution. On release of the Commission's interim report it was welcomed by Jim Murphy without significant comment.²¹

3.3 Wales Office

Wayne David MP was appointed Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales as part of the October reshuffle, replacing Huw Irranca-Davies who has become Parliamentary Under-Secretary at DEFRA. The Secretary of State for Wales, Paul Murphy, retained his position during the reshuffle.

²¹ Scotland Office, 'Jim Murphy welcomes Calman Commission interim report', 2 December 2008, at: <http://www.scotlandoffice.gov.uk/our-communications/release.php?id=3722>

The Wales Office continued to progress the LCOs sent from the National Assembly to Westminster. They successfully managed to get the Vulnerable Children LCO onto the statute book and have moved others further through the Parliamentary Scrutiny process (see section 4).

3.4 Northern Ireland Office

The main task of the Northern Ireland Office has been encouraging the Northern Ireland Executive to resume regular meetings, and to find some agreement between the DUP and Sinn Féin on the process of devolving policing and criminal justice powers to Northern Ireland.²²

The DUP and Sinn Féin managed to reach an agreement on the process to devolve these powers in November. This removes the last obstacle to Northern Ireland's gaining large-scale control over its justice system, and will require the creation of a new department and minister responsible for justice. Although no specific timetable has yet been released the process is expected to have been completed by May 2012. The two parties also agreed that the Executive will start meeting again.

4. Territorial Legislation and Motions

4.1 Scotland

Fears that the Marine and Coastal Access Bill would lead to conflict between Westminster and Holyrood appear to have been misplaced. The Joint Ministerial Committee managed to ensure consensus was reached between the UK Government and devolved administrations on the content and passage of the bill (see section six).

A further legislative consent motion (LCM) was passed by the Scottish Parliament authorising Westminster to legislate for Scotland on the provisions of section 2 and the amendments to section 5 of the UK Energy Bill. The motion opened up the way for the UK Government's proposed Renewable Heat Incentive, a financial incentive paid to generators of renewable heat by the UK Government on the basis of quantities of renewable heat produced.²³ The Scottish Parliament had already passed an LCM relating to the Energy Bill, back in June, permitting the creation of a UK-wide licensing authority for off-shore carbon storage (Devolution and the Centre DMR, September 2008).

A number of the Bills contained in the Queen's Speech are also likely to require the consent of the Scottish Parliament. According to the Secretary of State for Scotland the four Bills which will be most likely to require legislative consent motions are:

- The Children, Skills and Learning Bill (DCSF)
- The Coroners and Justice Bill (Ministry of Justice)
- The Equality Bill (Government Equalities Office)
- The Local Democracy, Economic Regeneration and Construction Bill (DCLG)²⁴.

The Scottish Government has already announced that it will introduce LCMs for these bills to the Scottish Parliament but took the opportunity to point out that such measures would not be necessary were Scotland independent.²⁵

²³ 'Memorandum from the Scottish Government', 30 October 2008, at: <http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/business/legConMem/LCM-2007-2008/documents/UKEnergy-LCM1.pdf>

In addition to the bills which require the consent of the Scottish Parliament other bills contained in the speech are likely to involve cooperation of the UK and Scottish Governments, such as the Child Poverty Bill, and there are bills which will apply to Scotland but which will not require LCMs, such as the Borders, Immigration and Citizenship Bill.^{26 27}

4.2 Wales

Legislative competence orders

Since October progress has been made on a number of LCOs. With the growing number of LCOs which have now received approval, the National Assembly has already proposed and passed a number of measures.

The Vulnerable Children LCO was made on 10 December 2008. The LCO transfers to the Assembly the power to pass measures relating to child poverty and welfare.

The report of the Commons' Welsh Affairs Committee on the Affordable Housing LCO has been released. The Committee supported the order with revisions. Their most notable concern was that the scope of the proposed LCO included the abolition of the Right to Buy and Right to Acquire. It also expressed doubts that the powers would be effective in accomplishing the Welsh Assembly Government's goals of preventing shortages of affordable housing. The Committee recommended that such suspensions are temporary, with set time limits and subject to regular review.²⁸

Scrutiny of the Red meat industry LCO has started in both the National Assembly and Parliament. Both processes started at the same time, an improvement on previous LCOs where complaints have been raised that differences in timing have limited the effectiveness of the scrutiny process (Devolution and the Centre DMR, September 2008). The Assembly Committee reported its scrutiny findings on 10

December and the Commons Welsh Affairs Committee on 23 February. Similarly, scrutiny for the Carers LCO began in both legislatures at the same time.

The Welsh Assembly has granted leave for the Displaying of flags and motifs on vehicle registration plates LCO, whereas the Official language status LCO proposed by Conservative AM David Melding failed to gain sufficient support in the Assembly to proceed. The legislation had been proposed in the absence of a Welsh Assembly Government LCO and consequently it lacked Government support.

Framework powers

Most of the 14 Bills outlined in the Queen's Speech will have provisions which affect Wales to a greater or lesser extent and two Bills will create new framework powers for the Welsh Assembly.²⁹

The Marine and Coastal Access Bill has been introduced in the House of Lords. The Bill will give the Welsh Assembly the power to legislate for coastal access in Wales and the Welsh Assembly Government will be given powers to control marine planning. The Bill also provides for the creation of a Welsh Fisheries Zone.

The Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction Bill has also been introduced in the House of Lords. This will transfer to the National Assembly the power to introduce reforms of county and county borough councils in Wales, including the power to reform scrutiny and review committees. This Bill does not, however, transfer any powers to reform the electoral arrangements of councils.³⁰

The Planning and Local Transport Acts, as discussed in the September report, have now been passed into law, devolving further powers to the Assembly. The Education and Skills Act was also passed, transferring additional powers over education to the Assembly. Since the overall purpose of the legislation is to improve and encourage greater participation in post-16 education most of the powers transferred to the Assembly focus on this area.

4.3 Northern Ireland

A number of Bills contained in the Queen's Speech apply to Northern Ireland and many potentially affect devolved matters. According to the Minister of State ten of the Bills proposed will require the consent of the Northern Ireland Assembly. These include:

- The Banking Bill (HM Treasury)
- The Political Parties and Elections Bill (Ministry of Justice)
- The Borders, Immigration and Citizenship Bill (Home Office)
- The Coroners and Justice Bill (Ministry of Justice)
- The Child Poverty Bill (Child Poverty Unit)
- The Policing and Crime Bill (Home Office)
- The Marine and Coastal Access Bill (DEFRA)
- The Children, Skills and Learning Bill (DCSF)³¹.

Meanwhile, in the rush to clear legislation before the Queen's Speech, various bills with relevance for Northern Ireland – covered in previous reports – received the Royal Assent: the Energy Bill, the Pensions Bill, the Climate Change Bill and the Dormant Bank and Building Society Accounts Bill.

During the period covered by this report there have been no LCMs discussed in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

4.4 Early Day Motions

Since September a number of devolution related Early Day Motions (EDMs) have been tabled, including:

- Multiple EDMs were raised on the issue of whether or not Great Britain should be represented by a single football team at the 2012 Olympics. Jim Sheridan (Labour) tabled EDM 2496 in favour of such a team, which was signed by 43 MPs. Pete Wishart (SNP) tabled EDMs 2496A1 and 2496A2 as amendments to Jim Sheridan's EDM, changing the motion to oppose a single football team. Pete

³¹ Commons Hansard, 4 December 2008, Col.13WS.

Wishart's EDMs were each signed by six MPs. Adrian Saunders (Liberal Democrat) tabled identical EDMs 2511 and 63 and encouraged the use of a Home Nations' tournament to select a team from one of the UK's constituent nations to represent the country as a whole. Adrian Saunders' EDMs received the signatures of six MPs and four MPs respectively. John McDonnell (Labour) tabled EDM 359 which looked at the same issue for a women's GB team, regretting the current undervaluing of women's football and encouraging the Government to support a women's GB team at the 2012 Olympics and to develop women's football in general.

- Three EDMs were raised on the merger of HBOS with Lloyds TSB. Malcolm Bruce (Liberal Democrat) tabled EDM 2461 supporting the independence of HBOS on the grounds of its benefits to the economies of Scotland and Yorkshire and encouraging the government to use its influence to secure a better deal for the bank. It was signed by 20 MPs. Alistair Carmichael (Liberal Democrat) tabled EDM 2269 requesting that, due to the loss of jobs in Scotland which is likely to result from a merger, the Government no longer use the merger as a condition of their bailing-out HBOS. It was signed by 18 MPs. Stewart Hosie (SNP) tabled EDM 2523 noting the loss of jobs and competition to which the merger might lead and suggesting that the continued independence of the banks would be better. It was signed by 12 MPs.
- John Hemming (Liberal Democrat) tabled EDM 17 calling for a review of the Barnett formula. It was signed by 31 MPs. Stewart Hosie (SNP) tabled EDM 12A1 amending the motion to include the intention to grant full fiscal autonomy to Scotland. Mr Hosie was the sole signatory.
- Dai Davies (Independent) tabled EDM 2430 condemning the cutbacks to political coverage on ITV Wales and calling upon ITV to reverse its decision. While the motion noted that similar measures had been taken by ITV across the UK it highlighted the specific problems for Wales, where a shortage of political coverage already exists due to similar measures which had been taken by other media groups. The motion pointed out that this was not good for democracy in Wales and that Ofcom had the power to award the franchise to someone else. It was signed by 15 MPs. In the new session he tabled EDM 116, an almost identical EDM which was signed by 13 MPs.

- Pete Wishart (SNP) tabled EDM 145 welcoming the Scottish Government's Year of Homecoming initiative and encouraging people to go and participate in its events. It was signed by 11 MPs. Jim Hood (Labour) tabled 145A1 amending the motion to express regret that the initiative's television advert has only been shown in Scotland and the consequent missed opportunities for encouraging tourism. The amendment described this as a failure of the SNP government and raised the hope that the situation could be remedied in order to avoid the affair being seen as just an attempt to stir up nationalist sympathy in Scotland. It was signed by 11 MPs.
- Mark Lazarowicz (Labour) tabled EDM 270 noting the failure of the SNP administration to describe how they intend to use the £1 million in funding they have gained as a result of extra funding for citizens advice bureaux in England. It was signed by 13 MPs. John Mason (SNP) tabled EDM 270A1 amending the motion to take note of various measures the Scottish Government is currently pursuing in helping those with financial difficulties and making additional note of the financial limitations imposed on the administration. It was signed by two MPs.
- Bob Spink (UKIP) tabled EDM 35 calling upon the government to abolish prescription charges in England, recognising that a recent deal with a pharmaceuticals company saved the NHS an amount roughly equivalent to that raised for the Government by prescription charges in England. It was signed by 18 MPs. John Mason (SNP) tabled EDM 35A1 amending the motion to add congratulations to the SNP in Holyrood for having announced the abolition of prescription charges in Scotland by 2011. It was signed by five MPs.
- Anne McGuire (Labour) tabled EDM 2330 congratulating the Government on its guidance to prevent house repossessions from occurring until alternatives had been considered and requesting that the UK Government encourages the Scottish Government to do the same. It was signed by 24 MPs.
- Diane Abbott (Labour) tabled EDM 2393 recognising the current lack of access women in Northern Ireland have to abortion facilities and calling upon the UK

Government to provide funding so that women in Northern Ireland can access abortion facilities in other parts of the UK. It was signed by 38 MPs.

- Pete Wishart (SNP) tabled EDM 146 welcoming the Scottish Government's provision of funding for Scottish school children to visit Auschwitz and condemning Labour MPs for 'playing politics' with the matter. It was signed by 11 MPs. Back in April Labour MP Ann McKeichin had tabled EDM 1466 criticising the SNP for failing to fund such trips.
- Andrew Rosindell (Conservative) tabled EDM 156 pointing out the importance of the UK's historic counties and calling upon the Government to introduce various administrative, cartographic and ceremonial measures to better recognise them. It was signed by 19 MPs.
- Mark Williams (Liberal Democrat) tabled EDM 179 noting that there is currently insufficient provision of treatment for sufferers of lymphoedema and requesting that the UK and devolved governments ensure a greater recognition of the condition and that treatment is made available everywhere. It was signed by 33 MPs.
- Eddie McGrady (SDLP) tabled EDM 196 calling for party funding arrangements to be reviewed as the current arrangements allow Sinn Fein to use public money for political activities which other parties are prohibited from doing. It was signed by three MPs.
- Katy Clark (Labour) tabled EDM 330 expressing concern that planned job cuts at BBC Scotland will lead to the overworking of staff and a decline in the quality of its output and requesting that the BBC reconsider its plans. It was signed by 21 MPs.
- Michael Connarty (Labour) tabled EDM 332 welcoming the UK Government's increased funding for retraining those facing redundancy in comparison with a lack of action by the Scottish Government and calling upon the UK Government to convince the Scottish Government to take similar steps. It was signed by 18 MPs.

5. Parliamentary Committees and Devolution

5.1 Justice Committee

The Committee has finished collecting evidence and is now preparing its report for 'Devolution: A Decade On'. No new devolution related activity has taken place in the Justice Committee during the timeframe for this report.

5.2 Scottish Affairs Select Committee

The Scottish Affairs Select Committee held two oral evidence sessions, one on the 'Office of the Advocate General for Scotland' and one on 'The implications for the Scottish economy of the current economic climate'.³² The Committee also visited the South Lanarkshire Credit Union as part of their inquiry into credit unions.

Responses of the Government and the Scottish Executive to the Committee's report on Employment and Skills for the Defence Industry in Scotland³³

The Government and Scottish Executive's responses to the Committee's report 'Employment and Skills for the Defence Industry in Scotland' were published on 15 October 2008. The Committee's report had focused around the construction of the new CVF (Carrier Vessel Future) carriers in Scotland. One of the main concerns had been over the delays in the MOD's signing contracts related to CVF. The Government explained the reasons behind these delays and detailed the measures in place at the MOD to avoid delays in signing contracts. The Committee had also raised concerns over the future of jobs and training in the ship construction industry. The Government sought to reassure the Committee about the future of these jobs and their support for training but pointed out that the Scottish Executive had a large role to play in these decisions and that training was a devolved matter. One issue of particular relevance which arose was the potential impact of Scottish independence on the future of these jobs. The Government was keen to stress the importance of UK defence contracts to the industry and the damage which secession would do to the sector.

³³ Scottish Affairs Select Committee, 'Employment and Skills for the Defence Industry in Scotland: Responses by the Government and Scottish Executive to the Committee's Sixth

The Scottish government pointed to a range of measures it was taking in supporting training in the ship construction and other industries. They rejected the Committee's belief that Scottish Enterprise had not been particularly pro-active and claimed that Scotland's approach to jobs and skills in industry is ahead of the rest of the UK. On the matter of the potential impact of Scottish independence they claimed that due to Scotland's capabilities in ship construction the industry would not suffer from secession and pointed out that similar independent countries actually do better than Scotland does at present.

5.3 Welsh Affairs Select Committee

The Welsh Affairs Select Committee has continued to scrutinise the steady stream of legislative competence orders (LCOs) proposed by the National Assembly for Wales (see section 4). The Committee published its report on the draft Housing LCO in October. In the process of conducting scrutiny on the Red meat industry LCO the Committee met with the National Assembly's Red Meat Industry LCO Committee. The meeting took place over video-link and involved an exchange of relevant information between the two committees; the chairmen of both committees expressed their hopes that this form of communication might be used again in the LCO scrutiny process.³⁴

Through October and November the Committee continued to conduct evidence sessions as part of their inquiry on cross border public services for Wales. The sessions held in this period looked into the provision of transport and further and higher education.

Two new inquiries were announced in November. The first to be announced was an inquiry on digital inclusion in Wales, particularly focusing on the availability of technology and the role of government and non-governmental organisations in promoting digital inclusion.³⁵ The Committee also announced an inquiry into the potential benefits of the 2012 Olympics and Paralympics for Wales.³⁶

5.4 Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee

During November and December the Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee has been taking evidence as a part of their inquiry into Cross-Border Cooperation. At the 5 November 2008 session the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) Sir Hugh Orde highlighted the political value to 'dissident Republicans' of the incomplete nature of devolution and claimed that until police and justice powers are devolved they will increasingly use it to agitate - a sign that devolution is not working.³⁷ The Committee also took evidence on Political Developments in Northern Ireland.

Government response to the Committee's report on Policing and Criminal Justice in Northern Ireland

On 8 October 2008 the Government's response to the Committee's Police and Criminal Justice in Northern Ireland report was published.³⁸ While praising the Historical Enquiries Team (HET) the Committee's report had raised concerns over HET's lack of independence from the PSNI and the demands this places on the PSNI's time. The Government recognised these concerns and said that the Consultative Group on the Past is looking into whether a consensus can be found on any alternative approach.

The other major point raised by the Committee had been that the current cost of inquiries carried out by the HET was in their view 'unsustainable' and that the Government needs to take action to bring the cost of inquiries under control. The Government replied that they were also concerned by the cost of inquiries and that

5.5 Regional Committees ³⁹

On 12 November 2008 the House of Commons voted to create select committees and grand committees for each of England's eight regions, excluding London where the regional structures are already more developed than in other regions. The motions creating the new committees followed for the most part the recommendations of the Modernisation Select Committee. The creation of regional committees form an attempt on the part of the Government to address the current deficit of scrutiny and democratic accountability of bodies and strategies operating on the regional level. The stated remit of the new regional select committees is to conduct this scrutiny and hold the relevant bodies and persons to account for actions and strategies employed in each region. Regional grand committees were not given a specific remit but their existence provides a similar opportunity for all MPs in the region to hold to account those bodies with significant impact in their region, regional ministers in particular, and to ensure that regional matters are considered by central government.

Regional select committees will hold regular meetings and in conducting their remit will have access to the same material and personnel resources as the House's other select committees. In contrast regional grand committees will only meet following a motion to do so by a government minister. Meetings could involve hearing ministerial statements, the opportunity to question the regional minister or conducting a debate on a regional matter.

These committees will exist for an 'experimental period', ending at the next general election. By creating two different types of regional committee the government may be looking for practical experience of how each model works in order to inform a future decision on how best to provide regions with appropriate scrutiny and accountability in the House.

of the Session', 8 October 2008, at: <http://www.parliament.the-stationery-office.co.uk/pa/cm200708/cmselect/cmniaf/1084/1084.pdf>

³⁹ House of Commons Library, 'Regional Accountability at Westminster', 13 November 2008, at: <http://www.parliament.uk/commons/lib/research/briefings/snpc-04411.pdf>

The Government's explanatory memorandum suggested that regional select committees might hold around six meetings per year, less than other select committees, and that regional grand committees would meet only a couple of times per year. Both regional select committees and regional ministers are expected to hold the majority of their meetings in their regions.

Each regional select committee will have a membership of up to nine MPs, and the party composition of the committee will reflect the composition of the House. This may require some committee members to be from outside the region. The regional grand committees will comprise of all the MPs with constituencies in the region plus at most five other MPs, to be appointed and discharged by the Committee of Selection.

The composition of the committees was sharply criticised by the Opposition, who had declined to support the Modernisation Committee's proposals. They argued that the composition of each regional committee should consist solely of MPs elected in that region, and should reflect the proportion of each party's MPs elected in each region. For this reason some preferred regional grand committees to the select committees, and opposed the appointment of MPs from outside the region to those committees.

The cost of running the new committees was another point of criticism. The combined cost of the new committees was estimated to be £1,345,132, with select committees forming the bulk of the cost. However attempts have been made to keep costs low, with much of the staffing provided by the Commons' existing staff. Unlike other select committee chairmen, regional select committee chairmen will not be paid (saving £109,704).

The new committees will start operation in January 2009. These new regional committees, alongside Government Offices for the Regions and Ministers for the Regions, reveal a growing institutional recognition of the importance of regional governance by central government. Indeed these institutions appear to be a weak reflection of the arrangements which existed for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland prior to devolution.

5.6 Territorial Grand Committees

The Northern Irish Grand Committee met on 18 November 2008 to discuss 'Organised Crime'. No meetings of the Scottish or Welsh Grand Committees or the Regional Affairs Select Committee took place during this period.

5.7 House of Lords Barnett Formula Select Committee

As mentioned in section 3.1, in December the House of Lords appointed an ad hoc Committee to examine the Barnett formula. Its terms of reference are to examine the purpose, methodology and application of the Barnett Formula as a means of determining funding for the devolved administrations of the United Kingdom; to assess the effectiveness of the calculation mechanism to meet its purpose; and to consider alternative mechanisms.

The Committee is chaired by Lord Richard. Its website explains that its terms of reference are intended to exclude consideration of

- the overall system of funding the devolved administrations-in particular the question of whether greater tax-raising powers should be accorded to the devolved administrations,
- other political aspects of the devolution settlements, and
- the distribution of funds within the different regions of the United Kingdom.

The Committee includes three peers from Scotland (Lords Forsyth, Lang and Sewel), one from Wales (Lord Rowe-Beddoe) and one from Northern Ireland (Lord Trimble).

6. Inter-Governmental Relations

During the period covered by this report there was no meeting of the Joint Ministerial Committee,⁴⁰ but there was a meeting of the British Irish Council in November.

The SNP Government in Edinburgh has continued to put legislative consent motions before the Scottish Parliament and promised to do so for bills announced in the Queen's Speech. Meanwhile, legislative power has started to flow from Westminster to Cardiff Bay as Parliament processes the stream of LCOs passed by the National Assembly.

JMC Agreement on Marine and Coastal Access Bill

Despite fears that a confrontation would develop between Westminster and Holyrood (Devolution and the Centre DMR, September 2008), an agreement was reached in November between the UK and devolved governments on the provisions of the Marine and Coastal Access Bill. The agreement was reached after discussions between the governments, starting with the Joint Ministerial Committee meeting back in June.⁴¹

If passed the legislation will bring about a co-ordinated approach to UK Marine planning and conservation and ensure that pedestrians have access to land along the coast. The Bill will also devolve further power to Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. The Scottish Government will gain powers for marine planning and conservation for the 200 nautical miles adjacent to Scotland.⁴² In Wales a Welsh zone for fisheries will be created and the National Assembly will be given the power to legislate for coastal access.⁴³ In Northern Ireland the Northern Ireland Environment Agency will operate elements of the new marine planning and licensing regime.⁴⁴

⁴⁰ Although the Cabinet Office press notice on 27 November (see n 41) said that 'a further meeting of the Committee is due shortly'.

These powers are however within an agreed UK policy statement, and exerciseable substantially by agreement.

It is expected that in due course both the Scottish and Northern Irish administrations will bring their own marine planning and conservation legislation forward in consultation with the relevant UK Government departments.

British Irish Council meeting in September

The British Irish Council held its eleventh summit meeting in Scotland on 27 September.⁴⁵ The Welsh Secretary Paul Murphy MP represented the British government, while the Irish government delegation was led by the Taoiseach, Brian Cowen TD, and the devolved governments were represented by their First and Deputy First Ministers.

The Council discussed its continuing work on a wide variety of subjects: demography and migration; misuse of drugs; the knowledge economy; social inclusion; tourism; eHealth; transport; minority languages. These subjects are pursued in sectoral groups (of which there are nine listed on the Council's website), with a lead administration for each group. It is open to governments to propose new topics, and at this meeting the Council agreed to consider the proposal from Scotland for an energy work stream; proposals on child protection, housing and collaborative spatial planning from Northern Ireland; and a proposal from the UK Government for a work stream on digital inclusion. The Council agreed to adopt an early years policy work stream, with Wales leading.

BIC Sectoral Group on the Misuse of Drugs

The Ministerial Group on Misuse of Drugs met in London on 20 November, to discuss how to engage effectively with communities around drugs misuse. The UK and Irish governments were represented by junior Ministers, and the Scottish and Welsh governments by officials. The Northern Ireland government was not represented.⁴⁶

Economy

The BIC meeting in September concluded with a discussion of the global financial crisis, which has given the devolved governments added incentive to work with the UK government.

The Welsh Assembly Government has co-ordinated All-Wales Economic Summits bringing together the Secretary of State for Wales, members of the Welsh Assembly Government and various business and trade union representatives to discuss the economic problems facing the nation.⁴⁷

In Scotland a meeting was held between the Secretary of State for Scotland, the First Minister, the Scottish TUC and the Scottish CBI. At the meeting they discussed the various actions taken by the UK and Scottish governments to deal with the economic downturn and agreed to have further meetings on this subject.⁴⁸

One area where the Scottish and UK governments did not find agreement was over the merger of HBOS with Lloyds TSB. The Scottish Government had hoped that HBOS could have been rescued without the need for the merger and blamed the UK Government for not leaving HBOS shareholders with any better alternative.⁴⁹ Back in October the UK Government had made the merger a condition of their bail-out of the two banks.⁵⁰

From 1999 to 2005 the Constitution Unit at University College London managed a major research project monitoring devolution across the UK through a network of research teams. 103 reports were produced during this project, which was funded by the Economic and Social Research Council (grant number L 219 252 016) and the Leverhulme Nations and Regions Programme. Now, with further funding from the Economic and social research council and support from several government departments, the monitoring programme is continuing for a further three years from 2006 until the end of 2008.

Three times per year, the research network produces detailed reports covering developments in devolution in five areas: Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland, the English Regions, and Devolution and the Centre. The overall monitoring project is managed by Professor Robert Hazell at The Constitution Unit, UCL and the team leaders are as follows:

- Scotland: Dr Paul Cairney
University of Aberdeen
- Wales: Prof Richard Wyn Jones & Prof Roger Scully
Institute of Welsh Politics, Aberystwyth University
- Northern Ireland: Professor Rick Wilford & Robin Wilson
Queen's University, Belfast
- English Regions: Prof Alan Harding & Dr James Rees
IPEG, University of Manchester
- The Centre: Prof Robert Hazell, The Constitution Unit, UCL

The Constitution Unit and the rest of the research network is grateful to all the funders of the devolution monitoring programme.

1. INTRODUCTION: MONITORING THE UNION

This latest report, published as part of the Constitution Unit's Devolution Monitoring Programme, covers developments in territorial politics at 'the centre' and across the UK as a whole from January to the end of May 2009.

The monitoring period includes the 10th anniversary of devolution in Scotland and Wales. This stimulated a period of reflection, with speeches and events marking the anniversary at Cardiff Bay and Holyrood. At Westminster, the House of Commons Justice Committee published a wide-ranging review of the devolution settlement in its report 'Devolution: a Decade On' (see section 5.1). Notably, the report described England as the 'unfinished business of devolution', advocating 'fundamental change' to approach the divisive 'English question'. The Government had hoped that its Regional Select Committees (see section 5.5), which were finally set up and began meeting during the period covered, would be a panacea to the patent lack of regional strategy and accountability within England. However, with the lack of cross-party support – upon which select committees traditionally find their legitimacy – their future looks dependent upon the outcome of the next general election.

In Scotland, the SNP Government pushed on with its 'National Conversation' on Scotland's constitutional future. However, the debate shifted with the deteriorating global economic backdrop. The dramatic fall of the Icelandic economy, and the savings of Scottish councils that its bankrupt financial sector took with it, has become a thorn in the side of secessionists; Alex Salmond's comments in 2006 that Scotland could be a part of 'Northern Europe's arc of prosperity'¹ with, inter alia, Iceland came back to haunt him. Meanwhile, unionist voices became emboldened by the more interventionist stance taken by Westminster. The new Scottish Labour leader, Iain Gray MSP, pointed to the £33bn that had been ploughed into Scottish banks – more than the Scottish Government's annual budget – while Scottish Lib Dem leader, Tavish Scott, branded independence 'economic suicide'². Though the SNP argued that the recession strengthened the case for independence, their line appeared to soften.

The All Wales Convention held its first public meetings, amid heavy criticism from both sides of the territorial-political divide. Fearful of low-turnouts at the meetings, the Convention lured people in with promises ranging from free curry³ to polka dancing with female vocalist Bernie Nolan.⁴ Labour and Conservative MPs in Westminster called the meetings ‘shambolic’⁵, and accused it of ‘going around demanding extra powers for the Welsh Assembly’⁶. Meanwhile, the leading pro-devolution pressure group Tomorrow’s Wales accused it of ‘spreading apathy’ and being ‘overly simplistic’ in its approach.⁷ The Convention aims to gauge public opinion, ahead of a referendum asking if the Assembly should obtain full law-making powers. However, there is still uncertainty as to whether the referendum will take place before or on the next Assembly elections in 2011, if at all.

The Northern Ireland Act 2009 received Royal Assent on 12th March 2009, finally allowing the process of devolving policing powers to begin in earnest (see section 3.4). This came amid heightened tensions in the six counties as two soldiers, a policeman and a community worker were murdered. Devolving powers over the police and judiciary has been long in the making, but still requires collaboration amongst the divergent parties in the Northern Ireland Assembly to reach consensus on the arrangements before the deadline of May 2012.

Inter-governmental conflict over finance was delayed by a resurgence in Keynesian economics at the Treasury, whose plans for the biggest annual government post-war deficit were revealed at the annual budget (see sections 6 and 3.2). However, as public expenditure is due to drop after 2009 and budgets are squeezed across the UK, the territorial financial settlement will continue to rise up the political agenda. It is widely acknowledged that the ‘Barnett Formula’ has been long overdue for reform. Two independent inquiries – the Calman and the Holtham Commissions (see sections 3.2.2 and 3.2.3) – continued hearing evidence, while the House of Lords commenced its own investigations in the ad-hoc Barnett Formula Committee (see section 5.8). All are expected to report later in 2009.

As the UK's economy continued its slide into recession, amid mounting discontent, expectations were that the constitution would be pushed aside to deal with more materially-pressing issues. These were spectacularly rebuffed when leaked expenses claims implicated all major political parties, and public trust in Westminster disintegrated. However, in the devolved nations the debate over devolution continues unabated. But although much power has been shifted away from the centre, the future of the UK's devolution settlement still depends on who is in power at Westminster, and what their policies are. With both legislative time and political capital now exhausted by the present Labour government, this awaits the outcome of the next general election.

2. POLITICAL PARTIES

2.1 Labour

It has been a humbling five months for the all wings of the Labour party. At the centre, a steady trickling away of public support and authority has come to characterise the latter half of Gordon Brown's premiership. In January, four Labour peers were implicated in "cash-for-influence" revelations⁸, then wildcat strikes against foreign workers used Gordon Brown's ill-advised turn of phrase 'British jobs for British workers'⁹. Following this, Damian McBride's resignation¹⁰ row brought fresh questions to the leadership of Gordon Brown, who was not immune to criticism even from inside his own cabinet; alluding to Brown's online video campaign for expenses reform, Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government, Hazel Blears, famously remarked: "YouTube if you want to."¹¹ Meanwhile, Labour was defeated in Parliament by a campaign led by the Ghurkhas' own Iron Lady: Joanna Lumley.¹² Finally, and most damagingly, the ubiquitous expenses scandal hit in May, with Labour in the initial firing line as the Telegraph revealed claims made by various MPs ranging from the extortionate to the absurd.¹³ According to one survey, Labour had dropped to almost half the popular vote in opinion polls to that of the Conservatives, even though many prominent Tories had also been implicated in the uproar.¹⁴ With European elections due on 4 June, morale within the Labour party had sunk to a new nadir.

For Scottish Labour's third leader in less than two years, Iain Gray MSP, the story was equally grim. Fresh from being slapped down in September 2008 by Westminster for attempting to claim a mandate beyond Scotland¹⁵, Mr. Gray entered the New Year clashing with the Government in Scotland instead. First in January there was councillor Glaswegian Colin Deans – who had left the SNP in 2008 and was duly branded 'Labour's new councillor' by Gray – who announced in January that he would become an independent instead.¹⁶ Things improved for Labour, however, when Mr. Gray and his band of MSPs were instrumental in the unprecedented defeat of the Scottish government budget. The budget only passed after Finance Minister John Swinney agreed to Labour's demands to boost apprenticeships.¹⁷ They were also forced to drop proposals to introduce a local income tax. However, in late March Mr. Gray was excoriated in the Scottish Parliament by Alex Salmond for 'misleading' it. Gray had claimed an apprentice was let down by SNP policies, though it was later discovered he had already started another job.¹⁸ However, events in Holyrood were overshadowed by those in Westminster, as the expenses scandal led to the resignation of the Speaker, Michael Martin, forcing a tough by-election in Glasgow North East – traditionally a Labour safe seat.¹⁹

In the run up to the European elections in June, the Glasgow by-election in the autumn, and finally the general election the following year (or sooner as both David Cameron and Alex Salmond called for²⁰), Scottish Labour was fighting a rearguard action whilst fearing for the seats many forecasts predicted it would lose.²¹

In Wales, the 'All Wales' coalition Welsh Assembly Government remained steady, albeit on shaky ground. In February, the Welsh Assembly Government decided to scrap its costly grant to Welsh university students, but only after internal disputes within Labour's partner in the coalition, Plaid Cymru.²² Then in March, two weeks before the McBride scandal in Westminster, First Minister Rhodri Morgan was forced to distance himself from a video portraying senior Tory and Plaid Cymru politicians as vampires and clowns.²³ That same month, Plaid Cymru launched a website promoting independence for Wales, aimed at the younger generation.²⁴ But in a speech in April, Rhodri Morgan branded this a 'tactical blunder', and pleaded with voters to 'stick to Labour'.²⁵ Nevertheless, in a speech marking a decade of devolution at the end of the monitoring period, Mr. Morgan predicted that the Welsh Assembly would have a coalition government '50% of the time,' and warned that Welsh Labour should not expect other parties to see working with it as a 'privilege'.²⁶

Labour's slide in the polls has been matched by growing goodwill towards an emboldened Conservative Party. This was largely a matter of personality and leadership in front-page matters; while Cameron acted quickly on the expenses scandal, Brown was seen to dither. In the devolved administrations, surveys of voting intent had swung in the Tories' favour.²⁷ Despite this, the Conservatives have yet to articulate a cohesive position on devolution. The party's ideological opposition to devolution in the early Labour Government years has been replaced by an ambivalent lack of agreement or even debate today. On this matter, it was Cameron who was dawdling.

In November of last year former Welsh Secretary Wyn Roberts published a report calling on the Conservatives to 'initiate a root-and-branch examination of the system of governance in Wales,²⁸ in the event of being elected in 2010. The review, which had been commissioned by David Cameron the previous March and took seven months to draft, stated that the party would 'consider' backing a referendum on further powers if the case were proven. However, the report also concluded that the devolution system was not working and that radical change was needed; though it fell short of clarifying what this might imply. Dismissing the report's lack of substantive ideas, the Welsh Liberal Democrats called the report 'a fudge', while Welsh Labour claimed the report's tardiness was a result of Cameron's 'dithering' over the central issue of devolution.²⁹ However, Welsh Conservative leader, Nick Bourne, stated it was a 'living document and will continue to be updated and revised in light of the ever changing situation regarding devolution.'³⁰

Six months later, and the position was no clearer. At the end of May David Cameron visited North Wales, where he offered lukewarm support for devolution. He stated he wanted no further movement to extend it until the present system had been made to 'work properly'.³¹

As the Conservative party becomes increasingly confident about its general election prospects, it remains unclear what the devolution settlement would look like under a Tory Government in Westminster. What is believed to be likely, however, is that such a situation could play into the hands of those in the 'periphery' seeking more devolution of powers. As Lord Elystan Morgan, who led the Welsh pro-devolution campaign in 1979, stated tellingly in May, 'it wouldn't be a bad thing for Wales to have a year or two of Conservative Government.'³²

While David Cameron took up the mantle of constitutional reformer,³³ the Liberal Democrats continued to be even more radical under their leader Nick Clegg. Though Cameron's declaration in January and then reaffirmation in May to reduce the number of MPs at Westminster by around 50 MPs both received widespread coverage in the media, the Liberal Democrats had already pledged to cut the number by some 150 in 2008.³⁴ Nick Clegg broke with centuries of convention by calling on the Speaker of the House of Commons, Michael Martin, to resign on 17th May 2009³⁵ (for which he was heckled by MPs at the subsequent Prime Minister's Questions³⁶). But, as leaders of both main opposition parties smelt Labour blood, the Lib Dems' stated aim of beating Labour to third in the European Elections was batted aside by fears of a surge in fringe-party popularity.³⁷

In Wales, the Liberal Democrats had a new leader in young Kirsty Williams, who was elected in December 2008. She said she wanted the party to get back to their 'radical reforming roots'.³⁸ However, as the BBC's Welsh Affairs editor Vaughan Roderick noted, despite their views reflecting those of much of Wales, the party has a 'cuckoo in the nest occupying their political space, and that's Plaid Cymru'.³⁹ She duly attacked Plaid Cymru and its Labour nesting-fellow in the One Wales Government at her maiden conference in April, saying they were 'fumbling around, clutching at straws'⁴⁰. Though she has received an 'excellent' report from her party's leader⁴¹ (who wields less power over her vis-à-vis other UK party leaders in the Lib Dems' federal party structure), it remains to be seen whether she can tilt the argument in the Lib Dem's favour before the next Welsh Assembly elections in 2011.

In Scotland, the Liberal Democrats' collaborative approach with Labour stood in marked contrast to their Welsh counterparts. This is unsurprising, as both have much to gain politically in undermining the minority SNP Scottish Government. Both were instrumental in rejecting the Scottish Budget in January – a result that would bring the Government down in Westminster. However, when it came to extracting concessions it was Labour and the Tories that got the better deal. While the SNP agreed to Labour's demands for increased funding of apprenticeships and the Tories for cuts in business rates, the Lib Dems had to make do with Alex Salmond's agreement to meet with the Calman Commission. Funding for their main initiative, an £800m income tax cut, had been bluntly rejected.⁴²

In May, Scottish Liberal Democrat leader, Tavish Scott, brought fresh tensions to the Party. With the expenses scandal in Westminster boiling over, Nick Clegg insisted that all Lib Dems would 'get out of the property game altogether' and would 'hand back any gain made when second homes are sold which were funded by the taxpayer'.⁴³ However, Mr. Scott said the Scottish Lib Dems would not follow suit, and refused to confirm whether he had paid capital gains tax on a flat he had sold in 2005.⁴⁴ Whether the expenses scandal would spill over into the devolved administrations was an open question at the end of the monitoring period.

3. DEVOLUTION AND WHITEHALL

3.1 Ministry of Justice

3.1.1 - Justice Ministry 'unaware' of devolution?

On the 1st of May the Ministry of Justice was criticised in a strongly-worded report by the Common's Welsh Affairs committee for a 'disturbing' lack of awareness of devolution.⁴⁵ The comments regarded the Ministry's decision to close its Legal Services Commission Cardiff office without consulting the Wales Office, and contacting the Welsh Assembly Government ostensibly 'as an afterthought'. They stated this was evidence of an 'inward-looking and metropolitan attitude that it is insensitive to the needs of a devolved administration,' which revealed 'a fundamental misunderstanding of the devolution settlement'. As the Ministry of Justice is tasked with overarching constitutional responsibilities, the committee found this 'disturbing'⁴⁶. With further devolution expected in areas likely to affect Legal Aid applications, such as carer's rights and mental health, and continuing legal divergence between England and Wales, it urged that the decision be reversed.

The row suggests the Ministry has not significantly improved its approach to devolution – criticised in previous issues of this report – since Dr. Jim Gallagher's appointment as Director-General for Devolution Strategy in 2007. Dr. Gallagher is also working as secretary to the Calman Commission on devolution in Scotland (see section 2.1).

Two of the Justice Committee's recommendations from its report on devolution – of a central department tasked with managing devolution, and more systematic education of civil servants on devolution (see section 5.1.1-2) – would help plug such knowledge-gaps in Whitehall.

3.1.2 – Report on People with Mental Difficulties in the Criminal Justice System

On April 30th the government welcomed Lord Bradley's report on people with mental health problems or disabilities in the Criminal Justice System.⁴⁷ It agreed reform was needed, and said it would establish a National Programme Board to discuss the implementation of the Bradley Report with Welsh Assembly Government Officials with respect to devolved powers. The WAG is conducting a separate consultation entitled 'Secure Mental Health Services for Wales', and will consider the findings of the Bradley Report alongside that review.

3.1.3 - Rights and Responsibilities Green Paper (Bill of Rights)

On March 23rd the government unveiled its Green Paper⁴⁸ on constitutional reform regarding the implementation of a British Bill of Rights and Responsibilities, launching a public consultation.⁴⁹ It acknowledged that a discussion of a UK-wide Bill 'raises important questions about the relationship between rights, responsibilities and the UK's governance arrangements in respect of devolution.'⁵⁰

Regarding Northern Ireland's own Bill of Rights⁵¹, which the Northern Ireland Assembly has been pursuing since its inception, the Green Paper states 'the Government does not wish the public debate around a UK instrument to detract from the process relating to a potential Bill relating to the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland.'⁵²

The government in Westminster cannot bring forward legislation in time before the next general election. However, with all three major parties supporting a Bill of Rights in principle, it is likely to re-emerge as a salient issue for the next Parliament.

3.2 HM Treasury

The first five months of 2009 saw the UK economy continue to slide into the most rapid downturn since World War II, with the Treasury downgrading its growth forecast several times to an estimate of -4.5%. With declining tax receipts and a squeeze on the public finances inevitable, the territorial financial settlement will continue to grow as a source of conflict between the devolved administrations and Westminster.

3.2.1 - Budget

On 22nd April 2009, Chancellor Alistair Darling presented his annual budget to Parliament, one month later than planned due to the emergency G20 financial summit in London.⁵³ For the devolved administrations, block grants rose above the rate of inflation (albeit slightly), while increased spending in UK Government departments resulted in Barnett consequential of £60m to the Welsh Assembly Government, £104m to the Scottish Executive, and £143m to the Northern Ireland Assembly Executive respectively. Their reaction was mixed.

In Wales, deputy first minister and leader of Plaid Cymru, Ieuan Wyn Jones, said that efficiency savings imposed upon it 'should have been delayed until after the recession', while leader of the WLGA, John Davies, stated many of the "One Wales" commitments had now become 'unrealistic and unaffordable'⁵⁴. In Northern Ireland, finance minister Nigel Dodds bemoaned the reduction in public funding available, but he did note that 'the net impact is less than had been feared.'⁵⁵ However, the bulk of consternation was aired in Scotland, as the SNP and Labour locked heads over the numbers.

The rhetorical battle centred on the difference between "efficiency savings" and "cuts" in public services, and whether a lowering of the increase previously projected in the Pre-Budget Report itself amounted to a cut. While SNP leader Alex Salmond claimed Westminster was cutting £500m for each of the next two years and putting '9,000 jobs in jeopardy'⁵⁶, Gordon Brown claimed there was '£2bn more for Scotland' and that any suggestion otherwise was of 'the dream world of the SNP'⁵⁷.

Nevertheless, the SNP's ability to hold Westminster accountable for cuts in its grant and thus public services underscores one of the central problems of the UK's 'Barnett' method of territorial financial settlement: financial accountability. As this formula becomes increasingly contentious in a backdrop of future declines in public expenditure, it will be interesting to see what recommendations are made by the Lords Select Committee on the Barnett Formula (see section 5.8), along with the Calman and Holtham Commissions (see below).

3.2.2 - Calman Commission

The Scottish Devolution Commission, chaired by Sir Kenneth Calman, continued taking evidence in preparation for its full report. The Commission was set up by the three opposition parties in the Scottish Parliament to review devolution in Scotland, including possible reforms to the territorial financial settlement. It will not, however, consider full autonomy of fiscal powers 'this is inconsistent with the Union'⁵⁸.

For this reason, the SNP had originally refused to cooperate with it. However, they did engage with it marginally in Spring 2009, providing it with evidence for the devolution of fiscal powers. John Swinney laid out the different options for reform of territorial finance, while stressing that full independence was his favoured route.⁵⁹ Their contact came as part of horse-trading with the Lib Dems over the Scottish Budget (see sections 2.1 and 2.3), though the nationalists claimed their opposition to the Commission had not softened.

In March, Prime Minister Gordon Brown further elevated the position of the Commission in his speech to Scottish Labour:

'We look forward to the Calman Commission's recommendations this summer. I can assure you today that if there are measures in this report which help Scots, and strengthen the union, I will support them, as all responsible Scottish politicians will.'⁶⁰

Though there are several bodies considering reforms to the UK's territorial financial settlement, the Calman Commission appears to have the most clout. Whether it will provide a 'blue-print' for overhauling Scotland's funding, or even the 'Holy Grail' of the future formula of the UK's territorial financial settlement remains to be seen. Its final report will be published on Monday 15th June.

3.2.3 - Holtham Commission⁶¹

The Independent Commission on Funding and Finance for Wales, chaired by Gerald Holtham, held two meetings during the monitoring period:

- In January, it met with officials from the Northern Ireland Executive to consider Sir David Varney's review of tax policy in Northern Ireland, the Executive's work on needs assessment, and the impact of the 'Barnett squeeze'.
- In February, it heard evidence from First Minister for Scotland Alex Salmond, as well as other Scottish Government officials. They discussed the Scottish Government's 'National Conversation', relationships between devolved administrations, and the possibility of devolving further fiscal powers to these administrations.
- Commission representatives also maintained informal contact with counterparts from the Barnett Formula Select Committee (see section 5.8) and Calman Commission (see above). The latter recognised that 'having a number of separate reports on devolution funding published around the same time without any overall coordination could dilute their total impact.'⁶²

3.3 Scotland Office

The Secretary of State for Scotland, Jim Murphy, continued in his constitutional role as 'custodian of the Scotland Act and secondary legislation,'⁶³ with several measures taken through Parliament as well as hosting summits, and answering Scottish Questions at Parliament.

3.3.1 - Glasgow 2014

Scottish Secretary Jim Murphy announced in January that the UK Government is bringing forward legislation on intellectual property rights for the 2014 Glasgow Commonwealth Games.⁶⁴ Intellectual property is a reserved matter under the Scotland Act (1998) and so legislation must be carried through Westminster. Under the measures, the resale of tickets (or 'ticket touting') for Glasgow 2014 events will be illegal, as it is for the London 2012 Olympic Games.

3.3.2 - Economic Summit

In March the Secretary of State for Scotland met with CBI Scotland, STUC and Alex Salmond to discuss Scotland's response to the economic crisis.⁶⁵ However, the meeting was overshadowed by the much-anticipated meeting of Gordon Brown with the leaders of the devolved administrations a fortnight previously (see section 6.2). No joint statement was released.

3.3.3 - Broadcast Summit

In March, Jim Murphy hosted a 'Broadcasting Summit' with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to discuss the future of Scottish broadcasting in light of Ofcom's Public Service Broadcasting Review findings.⁶⁶

3.3.4 - Cabinet in Scotland

In April, the UK Cabinet met in Scotland for the first time since David Lloyd George's 1921 meeting in Inverness. The meeting had been suggested and hosted by the Secretary of State Jim Murphy, who presented to the Cabinet on Scottish devolution and why he believes the banking failures of 2008 strengthens the case for the Union.⁶⁷

3.3.5 - Scottish Questions

Scotland Office ministers led Scottish Questions at Westminster on 4th February, 18th March, and 6th May. In the February 4th session, Speaker of the House Michael Martin intervened after repeated criticisms of the Scottish Government, saying,

'Order. May I remind the House that the criticism of the Scottish Government refers to a devolved Parliament? The Scottish Parliament is a creation of this House—we devolved the power—and prolonged criticism of the Scottish Parliament will give the impression that that is all we have to talk about.'⁶⁸

As there is no strict convention against inter-parliamentary criticism in the Commons, the extent to which it is permitted to criticise its devolved 'creations' will largely reflect the viewpoint of the next Speaker.

3.4 Wales Office

The Wales Office continued in its constitutional role from Gwydyr House as responsible for the smooth running of legislation at Westminster and of facilitating new Orders in Council (LCOs) through Parliament, with varying levels of expediency (see section 4.2.1). In addition, the Secretary of State for Wales, Paul Murphy, continued in his role as de facto head UK representative for devolution by heading the UK delegation to the multilateral British-Irish Council and chairing the Joint Ministerial Committee (see section 6.4).

3.4.1 - Ministry of Justice

As mentioned in section 3.1, the Wales Office had not been contacted by the Ministry of Justice regarding the latter's decision to close its Cardiff branch of the Legal Service Commission. The Welsh Affairs Select Committee was scornful in its condemnation of this (see section 3.1.1). The Wales Office was silent over the issue.

3.4.2 - Welsh Questions

The Secretary of State for Wales Paul Murphy and Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales Wayne David faced 3 question sessions from MPs at Parliament; on the 28th January⁶⁹, 11th March⁷⁰ and 29th April⁷¹. One notable issue raised from a devolution standpoint is the provision of cross-border health services, with calls for Welsh Health Minister Edwina Hart to abandon her much-criticised 'in-country policy'⁷² (see section 5.3.2). Conservative MP David T.C. Davies criticised the All Wales Convention for 'going around demanding extra powers for the Welsh Assembly... which will cost more money and inevitably lead to the break-up of the United Kingdom'. Mr. Murphy responded that the AWC 'is, in effect, testing the water. If the convention believes that a referendum is necessary, the people of Wales will decide.'⁷³

3.4.3 - Economic Summits

Welsh Secretary Paul Murphy attended the Fourth All-Wales Economic Summit on 6th February⁷⁴ and the Fifth on 7th April 2009, along with first Minister Rhodri Morgan and Deputy First Minister Ieuan Wyn Jones. The latter sparked a joint communiqué which outlined the various measures taken by the Welsh Assembly Government to fight the recession.⁷⁵

3.4.4 - Murphy criticised over claims

Welsh Secretary Paul Murphy was caught up in the expenses row in May over £3,000 in expenses he claimed to fit a new boiler because he believed his water was 'too hot'. Murphy's spokesman responded that the boiler was deemed unsafe, and that 'At all times he assiduously checks his claims with the Fees Office of the House of Commons.'⁷⁶

3.5 Northern Ireland Office

3.5.1 - Northern Ireland Act 2009: the devolution of policing and judicial powers

The Northern Ireland Act 2009⁷⁷ received Royal Assent on 12th March, less than a month after it was introduced to Parliament by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Shaun Woodward. The Act has been long overdue, with the wholesale devolution of policing and justice powers representing the final piece of major legislation in Northern Ireland to implement the Belfast Agreement. The DUP and Sinn Féin reached agreement on the process in November of last year, setting a deadline for the consent of the Assembly to the arrangements by May 2012.

The Act paves the way for the process to take effect through substantive measures and by amending section 86 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. However, it is only the first step in a much longer legislative march through Parliament and the Assembly. Subordinate legislation must be agreed, and a new Minister for Justice must be chosen by cross-party consensus to sit on the Executive Committee. The Act also establishes a new autonomous Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland (DPPNI), reflecting the ultimate intention that the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland be an independent, non-ministerial department. Finally, the amendment of section 86 of the 1998 Act allows for the transfer and creation or removal of functions between the UK and Northern Ireland authorities through Orders, and making this possible even where the competence of a given area is reserved.⁷⁸

After many years of disagreements, the Act marks the beginning of the formal devolution of the politically sensitive powers over policing and criminal justice. With a breach of the May 2012 deadline resulting in dissolution of the newly created justice department, the onus of action now lies upon the fragmented Assembly to reach agreement and elect the new minister.

3.5.2 - Dissident Republicans kill three

In March two soldiers and a policeman were shot dead by dissident republicans in County Antrim, 16 miles north of Belfast. The deaths sparked public outcry while stoking fears that the spectre of deadly conflict could re-emerge in the six counties. The soldiers were the first army deaths in Northern Ireland for twelve years.

On May 7th the Independent Monitoring Commission – the body set up by the British and Irish governments to monitor the peace process – released its 21st report.⁷⁹ It stated that the return to violence is an attempt to ‘destroy the peace process and return the community to the period of violent struggle from which it has so painfully and relatively recently emerged.’⁸⁰ The Northern Ireland secretary Shaun Woodward vowed that perpetrators ‘can be assured that they will never be able to stop political progress in Northern Ireland.⁸¹ He also warned that he would suspend the decommissioning amnesty if there had not been 'substantial progress' in disarming the paramilitaries by the deadline August 2009, when the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning is expected to report.⁸²

3.5.3 - Head of Parades Commission to step down

On April 8th the Chairman of the Northern Ireland Parades Commission Roger Poole announced he would step down in the following months.⁸³ The Commission was set up in 1997 by the Northern Ireland Office to make decisions regarding restricting the most controversial parades. His replacement is to be announced imminently.

3.5.4 - Victims' Commissioner appointment 'not lawful'

In April, the High Court upheld its previous ruling that the appointment of Bertha McDougal as an interim Victims' Commissioner for Northern Ireland by Peter Hain in 2005 was unlawful. It had said in 2006 that the appointment was unlawful because it was motivated by 'an improper political purpose, namely, so-called confidence building.'⁸⁴

3.5.5 - Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission 10th Birthday

On the 1st March the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission celebrated its tenth birthday, with Criminal Justice Minister, Paul Goggins, praising the central role of the Commission in protecting human rights in the six counties.⁸⁵ The Commission was established on the 1st March 1999 from Commitments made in the 1998 Belfast Agreement.

3.5.6 - New Policing Board Chairman

On May 7th the Northern Ireland Policing Board selected Barry Gilligan as its new Chairman, as Sir Desmond Rea, who had held the position since the Board's inception in 2001, stepped down. However, if the devolution of policing and judicial powers succeeds, both the position and the Board are likely to be abolished.⁸⁶

3.5.7 - Northern Ireland Questions

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Shaun Woodward, and the Minister of State, Paul Goggins, answered questions in Parliament on the 21st January 2009.⁸⁷ They answered questions regarding the Saville Inquiry (now expected in the autumn), parading policy and paramilitary decommissioning.

3.6 Department for Communities and Local Government

Council Overhaul in England

On 1st April 2009, the Local Government Minister John Healey declared the ‘biggest shake-up in local democracy in one single day since the seventies.’⁸⁸ On that day 44 councils representing 3.2 million people were replaced with just nine, replacing district councils with unitary authorities. All local services in Cheshire (East and West), Bedfordshire (East and West), Cornwall, Northumberland, Durham, Shropshire and Wiltshire will be run by these unitary councils.⁸⁹ The department said the changes would result in savings of £100 million per year after transitional costs, while 300 senior management posts will be slashed and the number of councillors will be reduced by 2037 to 725. The changes bring these regions into line with Scotland and Wales, who have councils run on a unitary basis. The two-tier system of county and district councils is still active in one third of England.

4. TERRITORIAL LEGISLATION AND MOTIONS

4.1 Scotland

On December 3rd 2008 the Queen laid out the government's planned legislative program for the 2008-09 session, in what the Scotland Office called the 'the most "Scottish" Queen's Speech since devolution.'⁹⁰ Eight of the eleven new Bills introduced by the UK government stray into devolved areas in Scotland or amend the powers of the devolved institutions. Under the 'Sewel' convention, these Bills therefore require the legislative consent of the Scottish Parliament through Legislative Consent Motions (LCMs).⁹¹

The SNP Government has continued to soften its line on such motions, where it had previously articulated opposition to LCMs as a matter of principle.⁹² But since forming a minority government in 2007, the SNP has steadily eased this ideological objection, delegating more and more authority back to Westminster. In fact, the amount of Bills consented to by the Scottish Government has brought accusations of laxity and being 'work shy'⁹³. In May, a study by the Scotland Office showed that in the first year of the SNP Scottish Government more bills relating to devolved matters were consented to and passed in Westminster than in Holyrood.⁹⁴

Protest has occasionally been voiced at this kind of 'counter-devolution'. The Scottish Green Party spoke against the LCM on the Borders, Citizenship and Immigration [HL] Bill on these grounds. Green MSP Patrick Harvie stated,

'I have not just mild concerns about, but fundamental objections to the LCM, the first of which is to the police-like powers that may be exercised by immigration officers. There are reasons why, in establishing a Scottish Parliament, we took the view that the police should be under the devolved competence of this

Parliament and the Scottish Executive, as it was then...Will the cabinet secretary explain why he, as a Scottish National Party cabinet secretary, thinks that those functions should be under the control of a UK agency and not a Scottish one?⁹⁵

In the event, the motion passed with a vote of 118-2 (2 Green Party MSPs voting against). Consent was given to five other Bills, with the remaining two LCMs lodged in May.

4.1.1 - Legislative consent motions (LCMs)

- Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction [HL] Bill – Consent agreed in principle 5th March 2009.
- Policing and Crime Bill – Consent agreed in principle 4th March 2009.
- Welfare Reform Bill – Consent agreed in principle 18th March 2009.
- Marine and Coastal Access [HL] Bill – [Creates UK-wide framework surround for marine and coastal planning. Also expands power of Scottish Executive to designate conservation areas.] Consent agreed in principle 18th March 2009
- Apprenticeships, Skills, Children and Learning Bill – [Relating to the management of Career Development Loans and the Managing Information Across Partners programme. Expands powers of Scottish Ministers to instruct the new Skills Funding Agency.] Consent agreed in principle 1st April 2009.
- Equality Bill – introduced in House of Commons on 24th April. Legislative consent memorandum lodged 7th May 2009.
- Coroners and Justice Bill – Though judicial matters are devolved, the Scottish Government ‘considers it to be extremely important that a common approach is taken across the UK.’⁹⁶ Legislative consent memorandum lodged 13th May 2009.

The Secretary of State for Scotland is also taking three Orders-in-Council through Parliament, making a total of 170 Orders in the first ten years of devolution.

4.2 Wales

4.2.1 - Legislative competence orders

Though Legislative Competence Orders (LCOs) continue to incrementally shift power towards the Welsh Assembly, problems with the process persist. For example, the environmental protection and waste management LCO, introduced in June 2007, had only just been referred to Parliament for pre-legislative scrutiny at the end of April 2009. Six other LCOs were still in progress at the end of the monitoring period, of which four were proposed by the WAG.⁹⁷

- Firstly, the affordable housing LCO was finally approved by the Welsh Assembly in principle in January 2009. This came after a dramatic climbdown by the Welsh Assembly Government in its dispute with Westminster over the divisive issue of 'right-to-buy'.⁹⁸ The WAG wanted powers to suspend the right of council tenants to buy their own homes in areas of acute housing shortage. Under the compromise, the WAG will acquire these powers, but the Welsh Secretary will have a veto over the matter; an unprecedented move. Nevertheless, the Order was flagged by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments in March for doubtful vires on the issue of right to buy, and will have to be reconsidered.
- However, the red meat industry LCO has had a much smoother journey through Parliament and the Assembly. The Order was introduced in September 2008, a draft approved by the Assembly in principle on March 2009, and is expected to be laid before Parliament by the Welsh Secretary shortly.
- Meanwhile, after consultation at Cardiff Bay, the carers LCO has been scrutinised by the WAC at Parliament, which recommended the Order go forward. The WAC report is awaiting the Government's response and will likely be laid before Parliament before the summer.
- The final Government-proposed LCO in progress concerns the devolution of Welsh language powers, which awaits scrutiny by the Assembly Committee, House of Commons Welsh Affairs Committee, and the Lords Constitution Committee.

Meanwhile, the two Assembly Member-proposed LCOs, on the provision of mental health services and domestic fire safety, have yet to gain Whitehall clearance despite the Assembly Committee clearing both in May 2008. This underlies one of the concerns of the LCO system: the de facto veto of the UK Government through unlimited delays. The Justice Committee discussed this in their report on devolution at the end of the period (see section 5.1), recommending that time limits for the presentation of LCOs be imposed upon the Welsh Secretary.

Lastly, the first Committee-proposed LCO on traffic-free routes is expected to be introduced during the summer session of 2009. No new LCOs were proposed in the period covered.

4.2.2 - Framework powers

The second route for expanding the legislative competence of the Welsh Assembly is through embedding 'framework powers' within Bills to be laid before Parliament. As noted in the January version of this report,⁹⁹ two Government Bills announced in the Government's Draft Legislative Program create new framework powers for the Welsh Assembly. Both of these were introduced to Parliament through the House of Lords:

- The Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction Bill made the transition to the House of Commons, with the second reading and preliminary debate due on June 1st.
- Meanwhile, the Marine and Coastal Access Bill progressed through preliminary readings, one long committee stage and three reports, with a fourth expected for the 1st of June and a third reading on the 8th of June. The provisions extend powers to Welsh Ministers of making legislation to protect marine conservation zones in Wales, though they must consult the Secretary of State for Wales.

4.2.3 – Concordats

⁹⁹ Constitution Unit, 'Devolution and the Centre: January 2009', http://www.ucl.ac.uk/constitution-unit/files/research/devolution/dmr/Centre_Jan09.pdf, p. 18

The Welsh Assembly Government published the Concordat it had signed with the Food Standards Agency in September last year. They mutually affirmed their commitment, 'in the interest of good government, to develop effective working relationships delivering the best possible service.'¹⁰⁰ The FSA will work with its Welsh Food Advisory Committee in advising the Assembly Government. The Welsh Assembly Government is updating Concordats with the relevant Whitehall Departments in light of the Government of Wales Act 2006.

4.3 Northern Ireland

4.3.1 – Bills consented to

On December 3rd 2008, the Minister of State for Northern Ireland, Paul Goggins, informed Parliament that ten of the thirteen Bills announced in the Queen's Speech were likely to affect Northern Ireland.¹⁰¹ Four of these strayed into devolved matters, and therefore required the consent of the Northern Ireland Assembly through legislative consent motions (LCMs). The Bills were at various stages of the legislative process by the start of Westminster's Whitsun break.

- The Marine and Coastal Access Bill [HL] was into its report stage in the House of Lords. The Assembly endorsed the principle 'of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions of the Marine and Coastal Access Bill dealing with Marine Planning, Marine Licensing, the repeal of spent or obsolete fisheries enactments, and Enforcement.'¹⁰² The motion passed on the 2nd March 2009.
- The Health Bill [HL] was agreed in principle by the Northern Ireland Assembly on 26th February 2009.¹⁰³ If passed, the Bill would allow the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to decide when and how provisions initially applied to England and Wales should be implemented in Northern Ireland. By the start of the Whitsun break the Bill had heard its first reading in the House of Commons, with initial debate due on the 8th June.

- The Apprenticeships, Skills, Children and Learning Bill had gone through the Commons and debate in the Lords was due to start on the 2nd June. Consent was agreed in principle by the NI Assembly on 30th March.¹⁰⁴
- The Saving Gateway Bill Account Bill had passed through the Commons and was in committee stage in the Lords at the end of the period. Consent was agreed in principle by the NI Assembly on the 23rd March.
- Lastly, the Northern Ireland Act 2009 was expedited through Parliament by the Welsh secretary, finally allowing the process of devolving the sensitive and crucial powers over judicial and policing to begin in earnest (see section 3.4).

4.3.2 - Research on LCMs

The Northern Ireland Assembly's Committee on Procedures has been researching into the process of LCMs. The Assembly's Research and Library Services published a preliminary report into its findings on January 26th.¹⁰⁵ It raised several concerns over Scotland's use of LCMs and its precursor in the 'Sewel' convention. The first was on timing, where consent is usually given in principle to Bills which are later radically altered. It was suggested consent be pushed back to allow more time for debate in the Assembly (with a report submitted in print beforehand, rather than orally as is presently the case) and that consent be given to a Bill closer to its becoming an Act.

The second point of significance was on the frequency of LCM use in Scotland. It was pointed out that although they are not a legal necessity, they have become perfunctory and thus casually consented to. The Committee on Procedures planned to visit the Scottish Parliament on the 29th of April to further their inquiry into Scotland's use of LCMs, though no report of their findings was available.¹⁰⁶

4.4 Early Day Motions

A number of EDMs were signed in the period January to May 2009 relating to devolution:

- Willie Rennie (Liberal Democrats) tabled EDM 467 condemning the SNP Scottish Government's proposal to lease 25% of 'the most commercially viable publicly-owned Scottish forests to private investment companies for up to 75 years', calling for its immediate withdrawal from the Scottish Climate Change Bill. It was signed by 31 MPs. In response, Angus MacNeil (SNP) tabled EDM 604, stating 'absolutely none of Scotland's publicly-owned forest estate would be sold as a result of these proposals.' It was signed by 11 MPs.
- Alistair Carmichael (Liberal Democrats) tabled EDM 473 congratulating Clydesdale Bank on the launch of a new set of Scottish banknotes, and welcoming the continuation of Scottish banknotes as 'testament to the resilience of Scotland and its financial sector.' It was signed by 27 MPs.
- John Mason (SNP) tabled EDM 751 welcoming the Scottish Government's record funding for the NHS in Scotland. It was signed by 6 SNP MPs. David Taylor (Labour) then tabled amendment EDM 751A1 inserting 'made possible by the generosity of resources allocated by the Barnett formula.' His was the solitary signature.
- Julia Goldsworthy (Liberal Democrats) tabled EDM 890 condemning the Government's refusal of the EU's offer to extend the deadline for spending unspent European Regional Development Fund (ERDF) money 'earmarked to be spent in England's regions,' which, 'has in effect been re-allocated to the Treasury.' It was signed by 49 MPs.
- Diane Abbott (Labour) tabled EDM 625 calling for the Government to provide funding for women in Northern Ireland to access NHS abortion services in Britain. It was signed by 63 MPs. In response, Sammy Wilson (DUP) tabled EDM 993 calling on the Government not to extend the 1967 Abortion Act to Northern Ireland unless consented to by the Northern Ireland Assembly. It was signed by 4

MPs.

- Peter Hain (Labour) tabled EDM 1120 welcoming the formation of the British-Irish Parliamentary Assembly as successor to the British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary Body, commending the latter's record on augmenting relations between Ireland and the devolved administrations, while speculating that the former could provide backbench scrutiny of the British-Irish Council. It was signed by 43 MPs.
- Jenny Willott (Liberal Democrats) tabled EDM 1416 calling for the central government grant funding system to be reformed so that Welsh police forces could be better funded. It was signed by 8 MPs.
- Russell Brown (Labour) tabled EDM 1261 noting that cancer patients in England are now exempt from prescription charges, whereas they are not in Scotland where healthcare is a devolved matter. It was signed by 34 MPs.
- Daniel Rogerson (Liberal Democrats) tabled EDM 1238 congratulating Cornwall's now-dissolved seven local councils for their hard work, and urging collaboration to make the new central authority successful 'as the first step to real devolution from Westminster towards a Cornish Assembly.' It was signed by 17 MPs.

5. TERRITORIAL COMMITTEES AT WESTMINSTER

5.1 House of Commons Justice Committee: 'Devolution: a Decade On'

On May 24th 2009, three days after the Parliament began its Whitsun Recess, the Justice Committee published its long-awaited report, 'Devolution: a Decade On'.¹⁰⁷ Its most pertinent conclusions and recommendations are summarised below.

5.1.1 - Devolution and the Centre

- Many of the UK's central political institutions have been involved in the devolution process, with the Ministry of Justice taking lead responsibility as the de jure guardian of the constitution. However, the report said, 'what is lacking is any one department which is clearly charged with taking a holistic view of the infrastructure of government across the United Kingdom and the constitutional and policy issues involved.'¹⁰⁸ This prospective "Ministry of Devolution" is something we have been suggesting for some years now, and would likely improve the centre's approach to devolution in light of the recent criticism of the Justice Ministry (see section 3.1.1).
- The posts of the three territorial Secretaries of State, two of which are now 'part-time', appear somewhat anachronistic post-devolution. In time they should be replaced by a single Constitutional Minister in the Cabinet, perhaps heading some form of a Ministry of Devolution.¹⁰⁹ Both the institution and the role would serve to 'maintain the coherence of the system as a whole'.¹¹⁰ However, the merits of the additional legislating responsibilities bestowed upon the Welsh Secretary through the GOWA 2006 needed to be considered before any such change went forward. The Devolution Minister could also take the responsibility for chairing the various inter-governmental bodies, such as the Joint Ministerial Committee, as the Welsh Secretary is currently doing.

5.1.2 - The Civil Service

- Though awareness of devolution has improved, it is still not sufficient in Whitehall. The Civil Service should work more collaboratively with the devolved administrations to improve the cohesiveness of the UK's policy, especially in non-devolved, reserved and excepted areas.¹¹¹
- Best practice should be mainstreamed across Whitehall, while devolution awareness should be a core component in the training of civil servants.¹¹² A more systematic approach to secondments is vital, as well as a unified code for the civil service, irrespective of whether it is 'unitary' post-devolution.¹¹³

5.1.3 - Inter-governmental Relation

- There is a necessity for formal arrangements to facilitate the co-ordination of action in areas of joint interest, good relations, and the promotion of common interests. 'The absence of such a structure is one of the weaknesses of the current devolution settlement.'¹¹⁴ (see section 6.1)

5.1.4 - Joint Ministerial Committee

- The report welcomed the re-convening of the JMC, commending its usefulness in securing agreement on the UK Marine and Coastal Access Bill.¹¹⁵ It did, however, recommend a broad review of the machinery for co-ordinating inter-governmental relations in the UK, and a more streamlined and strategic Centre post-devolution.¹¹⁶

5.1.5 - Inter-Parliamentary Relations

- Suggestion was made for a British-Irish Parliamentary Assembly-style arrangement for the devolved Parliaments and Assemblies to meet with UK Parliament and exchange ideas and hold to account the JMC.¹¹⁷

5.1.6 - The Legislative Process

- Scotland – The report commended the Scottish Parliament for the effective scrutiny of Legislative Consent Motions (whose use is currently being investigated by the Northern Ireland Assembly for their own use – see section 4.3), but it recommended the UK and Scottish Governments publicise the agreed understanding governing the use of LCMs, thereby strengthening the convention.¹¹⁸
- Wales – The perceived complexity of the Legislative Consent Order (LCO) process was recognised, and it was recommended that the Government encourage and facilitate the WAG to make the law more accessible.¹¹⁹ Westminster’s role in scrutinizing LCOs was supported, but concerns were raised over the effective veto power of the Secretary of State for Wales in delaying the introduction of such Orders (see section 4.2.1). It recommended rules on maximum time-scales be formalised.¹²⁰

5.1.7 - English Question

England, with 84% of the UK’s population, has been left behind by devolution. The status quo of England’s governance is, ‘at least called into question,’ with ‘further fundamental change’ needed.¹²¹ Various suggestions have been made:

- English Parliament – This would be the closest answer to the West Lothian question. However, it would require a substantially expanded bureaucracy, and would not address the subsidiarity criticism of the status quo: overly-centralised governance.¹²²
- ‘English votes for English laws’ – This approach, advocated by the Conservatives, attempts to answer the question within the confines of the present-day Westminster Parliament. It is, however, very problematic as it necessitates demarcating ‘English’ legislation in Bills, which can be difficult, if not impossible.¹²³ The reform could also create a ‘Parliament within a

Parliament’, which might pose ‘as great a threat to the Union as the resentment it seeks to address’.¹²⁴

- Reducing MPs from the devolved nations – This seeks to address the political problem of the ‘West Lothian Question’ (MPs from the devolved territories voting on matters affecting England). It does not, however, address the principle itself, and is controversial between the parties as they have differing levels of dominance within these areas.¹²⁵
- Internal devolution to England – Devolution to local government was not covered extensively in the report, but it was recognised that this is an option for answering the English Question. However, it did not believe that the dramatic devolution of powers to local government required would be sufficient, nor likely.¹²⁶

5.1.8 - Territorial Financial Settlement

The final issue the report considered is the Barnett Formula as the Centre’s method of financing devolution. This is also being considered by the Calman and Holtham Commissions in Scotland and Wales respectively (see sections 3.2.2 and 3.2.3), along with the Barnett Formula Select Committee in Westminster (see section 5.8). It found that the Barnett Formula:

- is ‘overdue for reform and lacks any basis in equity or logic.’¹²⁷
- concerns England because of the asymmetries in public expenditure in England vis-à-vis the devolved nations (this is the financial half of the ‘English Question’).
- lacks transparency and has already created political disputes between the Centre and the devolved administrations (e.g. no London Olympics 2012 spending consequential for Wales, but these are being considered for Scotland – see section 5.3).

It therefore recommended that the Government:

- publish ‘as a matter of urgency’ the long-promised ‘factual paper’ on the details of the Formula.¹²⁸

¹²⁵ Ibid. p. 62

¹²⁶ Ibid. p.68-9

¹²⁷ Ibid. p. 78

¹²⁸ Ibid. p. 79

- undertake a UK-wide review of Barnett and put forward an alternative (the House of Lords have taken this upon themselves after much lobbying by Lord Barnett – see section 5.8). This alternative should be ‘introduced with care’ (with a transitional period of at least two years), be adjusted annually, reviewed every five years, and be ‘robust and long-term’.¹²⁹

5.1.9 – Overall

- England as the UK’s solitary ‘undeveloped’ nation is ‘stuck in a pre-devolution time-warp’, with ‘fundamental change’¹³⁰ needed. However, the report fell short of advocating one way over another; merely recognising the lack of any consensus.
- Whitehall’s awareness of devolution needs to be stepped up, and the Civil Service should adopt a unified Code of Practice.
- A single department charged with managing devolution would improve the cohesion of the UK’s institutions and offer a more holistic approach to strategy.
- Reform of the UK’s territorial financial settlement is long overdue, as is the publication of rules formalising the Barnett Formula.

5.2 Scottish Affairs Committee

The Scottish Affairs Select Committee published two reports in the period. The first was the committee’s report on credit unions in Scotland, an institution the committee supports.¹³¹ The second regarded the committee’s workings for the 2007-08 session.¹³²

The committee also took evidence for its ‘Banking in Scotland’ report, due to be published later in the year.

5.3 Welsh Affairs Select Committee

The Welsh Affairs Committee was the most prolific of the territorial select committees during the first five months of 2009. The Committee criticised the Ministry of Justice's handling of its decision to close the Cardiff office of the Legal Services Commission (see section 3.1.1). In addition, it reported on the cross-border provision of services in health and in education, the Welsh economy under globalisation, and the potential benefits of the 2012 Olympics to Wales (or lack thereof).

5.3.1 - Cross-border provision of public services: Further and Higher Education

On 16th January the Committee published its findings on the cross-border provision of further and higher education in Wales.¹³³ Its findings were as follows:

- The Welsh Assembly Government is investing less in higher education than its counterpart – the Department for Universities and Skills – is in England, which has raised competition and lowered the capacity of Welsh universities for research. The Wales Office, which the committee oversees, has 'failed to make the UK Government factor Wales into its planning.'¹³⁴ However, this is partly the fault of the Welsh Assembly Government for failing to recognise the importance of the Wales Office for this purpose.
- The approach of research councils is 'blind to the social and regeneration consequences of their decisions.' The funding bodies need an 'increased awareness of the UK dimensions of their decisions',¹³⁵ it said.

Overall, the Welsh Affairs Committee found, 'the decision-making process on each side of the border needs to be more coordinated,' while governments on each side of the border must consider 'the consequences of their decisions on the population of the UK as a whole, particularly those living in close proximity to the border itself.'¹³⁶

5.3.2 - Cross-border provision of public services: Health

On 27 March the Welsh Affairs Committee unveiled its findings of the cross-border provision in health – a problem largely unique to Wales with its large and porous border with England.¹³⁷ Its general findings were:

- On the controversial 'close to home' value of health services provision – There is 'no practical or realistic prospect of diverting these well established cross-border flows, nor would it be desirable to do so.'¹³⁸ Therefore, closer links between English and Welsh healthcare providers and, 'divergent policies must be implemented in a way which accommodates the continuing flow of patients across the Wales-England border.'¹³⁹
- 'It is clear that there is a lack of co-ordination between the UK and Welsh Assembly Governments for cross-border health services between England and Wales.'¹⁴⁰ This presented significant dangers to patients and providers, with disputes likely. The Committee therefore recommends a new standardised government-level protocol, to 'clarify arrangements and accountability mechanisms'¹⁴¹ as a matter of urgency.
- Patients need to be better informed of the divergences in health services, particularly in border areas.

Overall, the report stated that the Department of Health needs to work closer with the Welsh Assembly Government, while the decision-making process needs to be 'more coordinated, more coherent and more transparent.'¹⁴²

5.3.3 - Wales and Globalisation

On 18th May the Committee reported on the impact of globalisation on Wales.¹⁴³ The report summarises the Committee's views on several aspects of the economy of Wales with respect to devolution legislation:

¹⁴³ Welsh Affairs Committee, 'Globalisation and its Impact On Wales', <http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm200809/cmselect/cmwelaf/184/184i.pdf>,

- Broadcasting – The WAC agreed with the now-disbanded Wales Broadcasting Committee that 'the UK Parliament is clearly the most appropriate place for debates on the wider economic regulation of the broadcasting industry'¹⁴⁴. However, they also said they would welcome any closer scrutiny of broadcasting legislation through the Welsh Assembly.
- Creative industries – The report noted the complex nature of competence in creative industries legislation, which is a part-devolved matter. It was, however, critical of Whitehall's lack of understanding in this matter. It said of the Government's boldly-titled Green Paper Creative Britain: New Talents for the New Economy introduced by the Department for Culture Media and Sport, 'Although the paper claims to outline future policy for the creative industries across the UK, little mention is made of Wales.'¹⁴⁵ It recommended more clarity 'on the allocation of roles and responsibilities'¹⁴⁶ in part-devolved matters, and called on all of Whitehall to work more closely with the Welsh Assembly Government.
- Intellectual property – As intellectual property is not a devolved matter, it urged the UK Government to 'work closely with the Welsh Assembly Government to ensure that the UK-wide regulation of intellectual property is fit for the demands of the modern, global economy'.¹⁴⁷

5.3.4 - Wales and the 2012 Olympics

The WAC released its findings of the Potential Benefits of the 2012 Olympics and Paralympics for Wales on the 22nd May 2009.¹⁴⁸ It highlighted:

- Lottery money diversion – Wales will be disadvantaged through a diversion of lottery money.
- Lack of tourists – Wales' tourism industry will benefit far more from the 2010 Ryder Cup than London 2012 Olympics.
- Barnett – Last year the Government declared that the Olympics would be a 'UK Olympics' and therefore Wales will not receive any Barnett consequentials.

Overall, the report concluded, 'it is still uncertain to what extent Wales will benefit from a London Games.'¹⁴⁹

5.4 Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee

The Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee released one report, summarising its work over the 2007-08 session.¹⁵⁰ The Committee took evidence in its ongoing investigation into cross-border co-operation, and political developments in Northern Ireland. Lastly, the Committee announced four new 'short' inquiries:

- Report of the Consultative Group on the Past in Northern Ireland – This inquiry will focus on the recommendations of the Consultative Group on the Past, which was established to 'find a way forward from the shadows of the past', and presented to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on the 23rd January 2009.¹⁵¹
- Omagh – 10 Years On – investigates the continuing impact of the Omagh bombing, with a focus on the sharing of intelligence relating to the bombing and lessons to be learnt a decade on from this tragic event.
- Human Rights Bill for Northern Ireland – The Northern Ireland Executive is expected to issue a consultation later in 2009 on such a Bill, and this inquiry will feed into that consultation. This is distinct from the ongoing issue in Westminster of replacing the Human Rights Act with a 'British' Bill of Rights (see section 3.1.3).
- Television Broadcasting in Northern Ireland – This short inquiry will investigate into the future of television broadcasting in Northern Ireland, mimicking the Welsh Affairs Committee's own investigation into the future of Welsh broadcasting post-devolution (see section 5.3.3).

5.5 Regional Select Committees

The Regional Select Committees for England have experienced a turbulent first five months. Having been assented to in principle on 12th November 2008 by Parliament, they came into effect on 1st January. Their formation has remained as contentious as ever.

Their members were appointed on the 3rd March, without any nominees from the opposition parties. They are all currently carrying out inquiries into the economic situation in their respective regions. However, without cross-party consensus or involvement, the huge fall in Labour's popularity, and a general election within a year some observers have wondered, 'can they survive infancy?'¹⁵² The answer is unclear thus far, as their remit expires at the end of the current Parliament when they will be reviewed. However, what is more certain is that their future depends on the outcome of the next general election.

5.5.1 – Background

The creation of regional select committees was partly motivated by the need to tackle the "regional governance" element of the "English Question". As Peter Riddell notes, England remains the 'missing piece of the devolution jigsaw'.¹⁵³ Though devolution has been partly premised upon securing the Union's future from the threat of nationalism, the policy-making argument has been one of efficacy: regional questions require regional answers. Seen from this "regional" perspective, devolution to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland has been a method of augmenting the subsidiarity and therefore policy-making efficacy of the UK as a whole. Thus, if the UK's "national" regions of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, with their relatively miniscule populations vis-à-vis England, can have accountable regional policy-makers, then why not England?

Motivated by this post-devolution question, but derailed by the resounding 'no' answer by the electorate to proposals to create an elected assembly in the North-east in 2004, the government turned to inward measures. Instead of elected assemblies, the government proposed creating regional committees composed of MPs from those areas (who thus have some level of accountability). This is a role similar to those of the current territorial Offices of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, though their primary role would be scrutinising the work of their respective Regional Development Agency (RDA).

Establishing these committees, the government asserted in its Green Paper on constitutional reform back in 2007, would 'offer an important step forward in democratic accountability and scrutiny of the delivery of public services in the English regions.'¹⁵⁴ Though the Green Paper on constitutional reform has lagged, along with Gordon Brown's "Britishness Agenda", nine new regional ministers were created, while the Regional Affairs Committee (which lay dormant since 2004) and the regional assemblies (which were non-legislative, voluntary organisations) were discontinued. This latter move in particular enlarged the perceived vacuum in regional governance and accountability, providing a stronger argument for the creation of the committees. Finally, on 12th November last year, the proposals for eight new regional committees (excluding London) with matching grand committees (to serve as forums for scrutiny) were pushed through Parliament by a whipped vote. The former were to meet six times a year, and the latter up to two.

5.5.2 - The appointment of regional select committee members

Though the agreement came into force on the 1st January 2009, it took until the 3rd March for the House to appoint members to the Committees. Like the vote establishing consent for their formation, this was pushed through by the government amidst vociferous debate amongst the parties:

The Conservatives reinforced their opposition to regional committees and regional governance in principle, with John Redwood stating,

'The north-east is the only part of the country that was allowed a vote on regional government, which was voted down resoundingly. What part of "no" does the Deputy Leader of the House not understand?'¹⁵⁵

¹⁵⁴ Ministry of Justice, 'The Governance of Britain', Cm 7170, July 2007, para. 120.

<http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm200809/cmhansrd/cm090303/debtext/90303-0012.htm>

The Government responded by attempting to reframe the debate, with Deputy Leader of the House, Chris Bryant asserting,

'The motions are nothing to do with regional government. Regional development agencies and other regional bodies spend a large amount of money on behalf of the taxpayer and it is inappropriate, especially at such a time, for that money not to receive proper scrutiny and consideration by the whole House, not only individual Members in a region. We are considering parliamentary scrutiny of the work that goes on in the regions.'¹⁵⁶

Previously, the Conservatives' opposition had nearly derailed the Committee idea altogether. A Motion put forward by Shadow Commons Leader Theresa May during the debate on 12th November to singularly approve regional grand committees rather than regional select committees fell narrowly by 233 for and 250 against.¹⁵⁷

The Liberal Democrats, on the other hand, accepted the idea of regional committees in principle, but contested the Government's position that they should reflect the composition of the House (i.e. be Labour-dominated). This would mean of the nine members on each committee, five would be Labour, three would be Conservative and just one would be Lib Dem. Jeremy Brown pointed out that on the South-West Committee, 'only one member of the South-West Committee would be a Liberal Democrat, despite the fact that the Liberal Democrats are the second biggest party in the region.'¹⁵⁸ Shadow Leader of the House, David Heath, expressed his consternation less reservedly,

"There is probably no idea, however sensible at the start and however valuable it may be, that this Government cannot turn into a dog's dinner with their cloth-eared intransigence, their inability to give up even a scintilla of power from the centre and their inability to grasp the concepts of parliamentary structures and accountability and the will of the electorate in the regions of this country.¹⁵⁹

The reluctance of the opposition parties to nominate MPs went beyond ideological differences, however. On being invited to nominate members of his own party from Worcestershire and Hereford, Peter Luff indicated, 'the problem is that one is a Whip, while I am a Chairman of a Select Committee who does not have the time, and my hon. Friend Miss Kirkbride is already on two Select Committees... Requiring them to serve on yet another Committee would undermine the Select Committee system.'¹⁶⁰

The absence of cross-party consensus, combined with the lack of multi-party involvement in the committees, has removed much of their legitimacy. Select Committees traditionally depend on the consensual nature of both their formation and involvement as they are meant to be Parliamentary rather than party-political bodies. For this reason veteran Conservative parliamentarian Edward Leigh pronounced them 'doomed from the start.'¹⁶¹

In the event, the Motion for the appointments passed narrowly 257 for and 190 against. Neither of the main opposition parties put forward MPs for nomination to the Committees, leaving them with five Labour MPs each.

5.5.3 - Committee business

All eight committees met in either March or April and elected their chairpersons.¹⁶² Most announced inquiries into the economic impact of the recession and the government's response to it, reflecting their general remit of providing a 'clear sense of strategic direction for their region.'¹⁶³

5.6 Territorial Grand Committees

5.6.1 -Welsh Grand Committee

The Welsh Grand Committee met twice in the period covered and once in the previous period, which had been missed by the last report.

- On 17th December 2008 the Welsh Grand Committee met to consider the matter of Public Expenditure in Wales, discussing the difficulties facing small and large enterprises, as well as the First Minister's meetings with the TUC and CBI Wales.¹⁶⁶

- On 21st January 2009 the Welsh Grand Committee met to discuss the Legislative Programme's impact on Wales. They discussed the two Bills in Parliament containing framework powers: the Marine and Coastal Access Bill and the Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction Bill. The Shadow Secretary of State for Wales, Cheryl Gillan, complained that the former had been 'dithered over for some time,' whilst Wales' 'marine habitats have deteriorated and our fishing stocks have declined.'¹⁶⁷
- On 6th May 2009 (the Welsh Assembly's 10th anniversary) the Welsh Grand Committee met to discuss the Budget Statement. They noted that public expenditure growth in Wales had not kept up with that in England, and demanded more funding for the Welsh public sector.¹⁶⁸

5.6.2 - Scottish Grand Committee

- No meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee took place during this period. The Committee has not met since 2003, and therefore remains dormant.

5.6.3 - Northern Ireland Grand Committee

- No meetings of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee took place during this period.

5.6.4 - Regional Grand Committees for England

- The Regional Grand Committees have yet to be appointed or meet.

5.7 Lords Constitution Committee

On 30 January the Lords Constitution Select Committee published its annual report. It noted that in the 2007-08 parliamentary session it had examined and cleared four proposed LCOs,¹⁶⁹ and had decided in July 2008 to extend its initial 12-month trial period for scrutiny of the LCOs for a further 12 months. At the end of this period it will consider whether it should continue in this role.¹⁷⁰

In addition, the Committee is conducting an inquiry into the 'Cabinet Office and the Centre of Government', which it said is 'often characterised by a more diverse, fragmented, complex, pluralistic and decentralised policy-making arena.'¹⁷¹ The Committee will inquire into all aspects of the Cabinet Office, including 'how the Cabinet Office's relationships with all units across Whitehall and beyond, including at a European and devolved level, have altered'.¹⁷² It did not state when it expected to release a report.

5.8 Barnett Formula Committee

The House of Lords Committee on the Barnett Formula was launched on the 10th December last year, as the Lords' annual 'ad-hoc' investigation into a specific area of interest. Its remit is to consider,

'The purpose, methodology and application of the Barnett Formula as a means of determining funding for the devolved administrations of the United Kingdom, to assess the effectiveness of the calculation mechanism to meet its purpose, and to consider alternative mechanisms.'¹⁷³

On 28th January the Committee heard evidence from an indignant Lord Barnett, the eponymous inventor of the contentious Formula that characterises the UK's territorial financial settlement.¹⁷⁴ Lord Barnett had been lobbying for the formation of a Lords Committee on this matter for some time. He was dismayed that the interim measures he instigated to ease political pressure upon the Government of 1979 would become a "Formula":

'I never dreamed it would go on for 30 years ... [In Government] you don't change something if you can avoid it, and so it became a "Formula".'¹⁷⁵

Referring to the present gap between spending per capita in England to that of Scotland (presently around £1,600), he said 'I don't think it's fair, it can't be fair with this kind of gap... if something isn't done... then the people of England will get more and more upset.' In his assessment of what a prospective future "Formula" should look like, he stated his belief it would be fairer under a system of needs-assessment, and that it should be flexible, and thus non-statutory. However, on which criteria were justifiable he stated, 'what is justifiable is in the eye of the beholder... those are political decisions.'¹⁷⁶

The Committee then held various evidence-hearing sessions, including in Cardiff on the 20th March and Belfast on the 25th. The panel heard from economists, academics, accountants, politicians, and others. This was followed by evidence from the territorial Secretaries of State on the 1st April.¹⁷⁷ The report is expected before the summer recess.

6. INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

As the economic outlook continued to decline in all regions of the UK in the first months of 2009, increased levels of intergovernmental conflict seemed inevitable. The annual budget was the most precarious moment for intergovernmental relations, as stinging cuts were widely anticipated. As it turned out, the government's plan for a record annual budget deficit of £175 billion meant that such cuts for the devolved nations were milder than had been anticipated. Though the Scottish Government remained the most hostile, the other administrations conveyed more support of the Centre (see section 3.2.1).

However, with the Holtham Commission, Calman Commission, and the Lords Barnett Formula Select Committee (see sections 3.2.2, 3.2.3 and 5.8 respectively) all set to report before the summer recess – and all likely to recommend fundamental changes – the territorial financial settlement will increase as a source of conflict. As with public expenditure levels, 2009 may represent the 'high water mark' for relations over the central issue of government funding.

6.1 - Framework for intergovernmental relations: out of date?

The Justice Committee's report 'Devolution: a Decade On' (see section 5.1) investigated the framework for intergovernmental relations: the non-statutory Memorandum of Understanding and the subsequent Concordats.

It heard evidence from a variety of sources, including some authors of the various Devolution Monitoring Reports. It remarked on how surprisingly cordial relations had been between the devolved administrations and the centre over the last decade, with not a single case referred to the Joint Ministerial Committee for arbitration. However, it acknowledged that these structures of co-ordination 'grew out of relationships between departments of the same government.'¹⁷⁸ Permanent Secretary to the Scottish Government, Sir John Elvidge, told the Committee, 'we have to reflect on the fact that they were written and tested in one era of political relationships and it is an open question whether they will prove as robust in a changing era of political relationships.¹⁷⁹ Further, the Committee found that these relationships had, until very recently, 'operated within a context of record levels of public expenditure within the United Kingdom.' Current economic realities, it said, 'may sharpen different territorial interests, and this has the potential to increase the levels of tension and dispute between governments.'¹⁸⁰

With both eras – of rising public expenditure and amicable relations rooted in administrations of a shared political party – now firmly over, the inquiry found 'a broad consensus that these arrangements were no longer necessarily fit for purpose given the current political and economic climate in the United Kingdom.'¹⁸¹ It affirmed that a formal transparent structure is now needed to facilitate the co-ordination of action in areas of joint interest, good relations, and the promotion of common interests. 'The absence of such a structure is one of the weaknesses of the current devolution settlement.'¹⁸²

Both of the JMC's sub-committees – 'Europe' and 'Domestic' (the latter merged the previous three sub-committees on 'Knowledge Economy', 'Health' and 'Poverty') – met, but both continued to be tight-lipped about what issues were discussed and what were the outcomes.

This issue of opacity was also mentioned in the Justice Committee's report on devolution (see section 5.1). It quoted former Secretary of State for Scotland, Des Browne, as stating there was a 'convention that we do not surface that disagreement because people concentrate on that,' because, 'it does not seem... that governance would be improved at all by having this out in the public domain.'¹⁸³ However, the Committee believed the concern of effective governance 'missed the point' that:

'these structures facilitate relationships between governments, who may have different legitimate positions, different political mandates, and who are accountable to different parts of the electorate. They are not conversations within a single government, but between separate governments.’¹⁸⁴

It cited a need for ‘culture change in Whitehall’ so that it may ‘welcome that diversity rather than be threatened by it.’¹⁸⁵

- The Joint Ministerial Committee (Europe) met on 9th March in London, chaired by the Foreign Secretary David Miliband, to discuss the UK’s EU interests. No report or minutes were published.
- Two days later on 11th March 2009 the Joint Ministerial Committee (Domestic), also known as ‘JMC-D’, had its first ever meeting, also held in London. Ministers discussed the Welfare Reform Bill and the loophole that allows prisoners to sue the Scottish Government over ‘doubled up slopping out’¹⁸⁶ outside the one-year time bar, amongst other matters.
- The following day on the 12th March, Finance Ministers from the devolved administrations and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Yvette Cooper, took part in a quadrilateral meeting in Edinburgh.¹⁸⁷
- JMC-D met a second time on the 13th May. No report was released, but Lord Wallace of Tankerness did submit a written question to the Government to ask ‘who represented them and each of the devolved administration... what subjects were discussed; and what outcomes were agreed.’¹⁸⁸ The question remains unanswered.
- There was no plenary meeting of the Joint Ministerial Committee during the first five months of 2009.
- However, on 26th February Gordon Brown met with leaders of the devolved administrations to discuss the recession.¹⁸⁹ This was the first time Brown had met face-to-face with the Scottish First Minister Alex Salmond since April 2008, and relations remained frosty. Subsequently, there was little agreement, even as to what had been agreed.¹⁹⁰

6.4 - British-Irish Council

The British-Irish Council held its twelfth Summit on the 20th February 2009 in Cardiff. It released a Communiqué detailing what was discussed.¹⁹¹ In attendance from Westminster was the Secretary of State for Wales, Paul Murphy (continuing in his implicit role as the major multi-lateral representative for devolution), and Minister for the Third Sector, Kevin Brennan. Other notable attendees included the Taoiseach of Ireland, Brian Cowen, and First Ministers from all the devolved nations. Primary topics included the economic downturn, promoting social inclusion (particularly involving the third sector's involvement), drug abuse, the environment, and transport. The next Summit will be held in October 2009 in Jersey.

6.5 - British-Irish Parliamentary Assembly

The British-Irish Parliamentary Assembly (successor to the British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary Body), met in plenary in Donegal, Ireland on 29th March 2009. This marked the organisation's 38th meeting, which now includes 50 representatives from Westminster, the Northern Ireland Assembly, the Welsh Assembly, the Scottish Parliament, the Isle of Man, and the Channel Islands. Issues discussed included renewable energy, national ID cards, the integration of migrant workers and calls for the British government to release all intelligence files in relation to the Omagh bombing, a decade after the attack killed 29 people.¹⁹²

The day before the meetings, talks were held on the possibility of Cornwall becoming a member. The county, which now has its own 'super-council' (see section 3.6), is seeking 'a place at certain tables' to 'develop not just cultural but also cordial political
