

Words you might be unsure about

You will hear lots of words during the Citizens' Assembly relating to democracy and different parts of the democratic system. Some of these might be unfamiliar to you. Or you might have heard them, but be unsure exactly what they mean.

That's no problem! We hope that this list will give you some helpful pointers. If you're still unsure, remember that you're always welcome to ask.

If you hear words that you think should be added to this list, please let us know. You can mention it to your group facilitator, or drop a note to the Assembly email address (cademocracyuk@involve.org.uk).

Key terms

Democracy – Democracy basically means rule by the citizens themselves. It can take many different forms, as we will explore during the Citizens' Assembly.

United Kingdom – The United Kingdom (UK) of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is made up of four parts. These are England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. Great Britain refers to England, Wales and Scotland.

Parts of the democratic system

Government – The government is the group of people in charge of running the country. It is also known as the executive. The United Kingdom's government contains the Prime Minister, ministers and the civil service.

Prime Minister – The Prime Minister is the head of the government of the United Kingdom. They are normally the leader of their political party. Boris Johnson is the current Prime Minister, and leader of the Conservative Party.

Each of the devolved governments (see below) also has a head. Wales and Scotland each have a First Minister. Northern Ireland has a First Minister and deputy First Minister, who share the responsibility of running their executive.

Minister – A minister is a politician with responsibility for an area of government policy, such as Health or Education or Transport. Ministers who are in charge of entire government departments (such as the Department of Health and Social Care) normally hold the position of Secretary of State. Each of them is supported by a small team of junior ministers.

Ministers for the United Kingdom are chosen by the Prime Minister and come from either the House of Commons or the House of Lords (see below).

Cabinet – The Cabinet is the team of the most senior ministers in the government.

Civil Service – The Civil Service is the group of administrators who help the government develop and implement its policies. Members of the Civil Service are called civil servants. They are neutral – they don't take sides in political debates.

Legislature – A legislature is a body with the authority to make or change laws. It also holds debates and scrutinises the work of the executive.

Parliament – 'Parliament' is another word for 'legislature'. The Westminster Parliament is the legislature of the United Kingdom as a whole. It is based in London and has two 'chambers': the House of Commons and the House of Lords. Members of either chamber are sometimes called 'parliamentarians'.

House of Commons – The House of Commons is the main, or 'first', chamber of the Westminster Parliament. The government of the day needs the support (or 'confidence') of the House of Commons to stay in power. The House of Commons has 650 elected Members of Parliament (MPs), each representing a part of the country (known as a 'constituency'). Most MPs are members of a political party.

House of Lords – The House of Lords is the second chamber of the Westminster Parliament. It is made up of around 800 unelected peers. Its powers are somewhat weaker than those of the House of Commons. Its members rarely try to block something that the majority in the elected House of Commons want.

Members of Parliament – Members of Parliament, or MPs, are elected representatives who represent their constituency in the House of Commons. They are normally elected in general elections (see below).

Peers – Members of the House of Lords are called peers. While peers are not elected, there are three ways in which someone can become a peer. Most (currently almost 700) are appointed for life, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. Some (up to 92) have an inherited title. A smaller number (up to 26) are bishops in the Church of England.

Whips – Whips are either MPs or peers who work on behalf of their political party in parliament. Their role is to manage the relationship between their party leadership and its MPs and/or peers, and to encourage the latter two groups to vote according to the party's policies.

Select Committee – A select committee is a group of MPs or peers from different parties who scrutinise a specific area of government policy. For example, the Foreign Affairs Select Committee scrutinises the work of the Foreign, Commonwealth and Development Office. The members of select committees are chosen by their fellow MPs or peers. Select committees can call experts and ministers to give advice, ask the government for information, and make recommendations.

Devolved administrations – Decision-making on many matters is ‘devolved’ in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland. That means that decisions about, say, the health service or schools in Scotland are made in Scotland.

Scotland has the Scottish Parliament and Scottish government. Wales has the Welsh Parliament, or Senedd, and the Welsh government. Northern Ireland has the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Northern Ireland Executive.

In England, such matters are decided by the UK Parliament and government.

Local government – Local government is made up of councils with responsibility for providing a range of services in local areas. It takes different forms in different parts of the country, and some places also have regional mayors. Local government is largely run by elected councillors.

Political party – A political party is a group of people who share a common ideology or set of political goals. Political parties compete between each other to win votes and seats in elections, in order to advance their political aims.

Judiciary – The judiciary is often called the ‘third branch’ of the state, along with the executive (government) and legislature (parliament). It is made up of courts, overseen by judges. It is responsible for determining whether the law has been followed or broken in particular cases, and what should happen if it has been broken. There are three separate legal systems in the United Kingdom: England and Wales; Scotland; and Northern Ireland.

Supreme Court – The Supreme Court is the highest court in the United Kingdom. It can hear appeals of specific cases from lower courts in any of the United Kingdom’s three legal systems.

Watchdog – A watchdog is a person or organisation responsible for making sure that individuals and groups follow particular standards and do not break the law.

Taking part in democracy

Representative democracy – Representative democracy is a form of democracy in which decisions are made by representatives who have been elected.

General election – At a general election, all of the seats in parliament are up for election. There are general elections in the UK for the UK Parliament (the House of Commons), the Scottish Parliament, the Senedd, and the Northern Ireland Assembly. General elections for each body usually take place every five years – though general elections for the House of Commons sometimes happen sooner.

Petition – The word ‘petition’ is sometimes used to mean something that people can sign in order to express their view on an issue. And sometimes it is used to mean the act of asking government to do something. Petitions on the UK Parliament’s petitions website with 10,000 signatures will receive a response from government, while those with 100,000 signatures will be considered for debate in Parliament.

Recall – Recall is the process through which an MP’s constituents can force a special by-election for that parliamentary seat. In the UK Parliament, the recall process can only begin if the MP in question has been sent to prison or found guilty of a serious breach of the rules of Parliament. If that happens, a petition is opened that the MP’s constituents can choose to sign. If at least 10% of those constituents sign the petition, the MP stops being an MP and a by-election is held. Recall was first introduced in the UK in 2015. Since then, there have been three recall petitions. Two of those passed the 10% threshold requiring a by-election. At each of those by-elections, a new MP was elected.

Direct democracy – Direct democracy is a form of democracy in which citizens – rather than representatives – decide issues, by directly voting on them.

Referendum – At a referendum, citizens vote directly on an issue. Recent examples in the United Kingdom include the 2011 referendum on the voting system, the 2014 Scottish independence referendum, and the 2016 European Union referendum.

Deliberative democracy – Deliberative democracy is a form of democracy in which decisions are only taken after they have been discussed, or ‘deliberated’, in detail.

Citizens’ assembly – A citizens’ assembly is a fairly new democratic tool that is increasingly being used around the world. It aims to bring together a group of people who broadly represent the whole community. The people who attend learn about issues, discuss them with one another, and then make recommendations about what should happen.

Participatory democracy – Participatory democracy is a term used to mean different things. In the context of this Assembly, it refers to a way of doing democracy in which anyone is free to join discussions that help to shape decisions. Participatory democracy is most often used at the local level, when a community can get together to make decisions affecting their future.

Judicial review – Judicial review is a type of court case in which the lawfulness of a government action is challenged.

Other words that you might hear

Constitution – A constitution is a summary of the key principles and rules by which a country should be organised and governed. Unlike most countries, the United Kingdom does not have its constitution written down in a single document.

Parliamentary sovereignty – Parliamentary sovereignty is one of the key principles in the UK's democracy. The term means that the UK Parliament can make or unmake any law, and that there is no higher form of authority in the UK.

Rights – Rights are basic entitlements that each citizen possesses. Examples of widely accepted rights are freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, the right to a fair trial and freedom from torture.

Human Rights Act – The Human Rights Act 1998 is an Act of Parliament that sets out rights and freedoms that anyone in the UK is entitled to. These rights – which include freedom from torture, freedom of expression and the right to a fair trial – are those set out by the European Convention on Human Rights.

Legislation – The word 'legislation' is sometimes used to mean 'law' and sometimes to mean the process of creating new law(s). In the UK Parliament, there are two types of legislation. The main laws, that Parliament debates in detail and votes on, are called primary legislation. Ministers or official bodies can make generally smaller changes to the law without such a big role for Parliament. This is called secondary or delegated legislation.

Private Members' bills – Although legislation is usually introduced to the UK Parliament by government ministers in either the Commons or the Lords, MPs and peers who are not ministers can introduce legislation through Private Members' bills. These bills have less chance of becoming law than legislation introduced by the government, but they can draw attention to an issue and influence the government.

Prime Minister's Questions – Prime Minister's Questions (also known as PMQs) takes place each week in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister, or occasionally their deputy, takes questions from MPs for half an hour on each Wednesday that the House of Commons meets.

Majority government – A majority government is a government that holds more than half of the seats in the House of Commons. In the UK system, a single political party is often able to form a majority government, but this is not always the case.

Opposition – Those political parties which are not part of the governing majority jointly form the opposition. The largest party in the House of Commons that is not in government is known as the 'Official Opposition' and its leader becomes 'Leader of the Opposition'. The role of the Official Opposition is to scrutinise the work of government.

Coalition – A coalition occurs when two or more parties decide to form a government together. This is usually because no party has enough seats in parliament to govern on its own.

Speaker – The Speaker is an MP or peer who has been elected by their chamber (either the House of Commons or the House of Lords) to act as Chair during that House's debates. Once elected, the Speaker can no longer be involved with their party and must be politically neutral.

Norms – Norms are standards of behaviour and actions that are widely accepted and considered desirable.

Conventions – Conventions are unwritten understandings about how something should be done. Although conventions can't be enforced legally, they are almost always followed.

Manifesto – A manifesto is a document published by a political party before an election. It contains that party's proposed policies and spending plans.

Scrutiny – Scrutiny is the close examination and investigation of government policies, actions and spending.

Pressure group – A pressure group is an organisation that seeks to raise the public profile of issues, and advocates certain reforms and policies to tackle these issues. Examples of pressure groups include Oxfam, Extinction Rebellion and the Taxpayers' Alliance. Trade unions and business organisations are also pressure groups.

Lobbying – Lobbying is an attempt to convince politicians or officials to support a certain policy. Lobbying can be done by individual citizens, but it is also done by organised pressure groups.

Accountability – Accountability is the process through which people with responsibilities are required to explain and justify the decisions they have made, and, if necessary, face consequences. For example, parliaments hold government ministers to account. And voters can hold their elected representatives to account.

Consensus – Consensus is the idea that decisions can only be taken when all of the people involved agree with the decision or proposal in question.
