Part I: Preliminary Formal Business

15 ACADEMIC BOARD MINUTES

15.1 The minutes of the AB meeting of 3 November 2021 [AB Minutes 1-14, 2021-22] were confirmed, subject to the deletion of footnote 5.
16 MATTERS ARISING

16.1 In respect of the arrangements for the return to campus [AB Minute 4, 2021-2022], it was confirmed that details of a decision regarding the use of Sage methodology would be circulated to members of Academic Board.

Part II: Matters for Discussion

17 UCL AND STONEWALL (Paper 2-13)

17.1 The Provost noted that neither UCL’s commitment to supporting people of diverse genders and sexualities, nor its commitment to academic freedom, were up for debate. In advance of the discussion, he also noted that some staff and students identifying as LGBTQ+ worked in jurisdictions where that was unlawful or culturally very difficult. With a view to the possibility of statements about the current meeting being made on social media, he reminded members that comments at Academic Board are not usually attributed to individuals in the minutes, and that it was important to respect people’s ability to control the way in which they shared information about their own identity.

17.2 The Pro-Provost (Equity and Inclusion) introduced the paper. UCL had been a member of the Stonewall UK Diversity Champions Programme since 2006, and has submitted to the Stonewall Workplace Equality Index regularly since 2009. The Diversity Champions Programme provides employers with a source of advice and support on advancing LGBTQ+ equality in the workplace. In March 2020, in view of the financial circumstances in the early days of the pandemic, the EDI team in consultation with the LGBTQ+ Equality Steering Group had decided not to renew UCL’s annual subscription to either the Diversity Champions Programme or the Global Diversity Champions Programme. The University Management Committee (UMC) was now due to reconsider UCL’s formal relationship with Stonewall, including both whether to re-join the Diversity Champions Programme, and/or the Global Diversity Champions Programme, and whether UCL should submit to the 2023 Stonewall Workplace Equality Index, and wished to have a sense of AB’s views on this matter.

17.3 The paper was not a piece of research and did not rest on a survey of particular groups. The paper instead sought to explain the background, to present the arguments for and against membership of the Diversity Champions Programme and entering the Workplace Equality Index, and to canvass views on the issue. In support of that process it also enumerated a number of more detailed questions to be considered, relating to: the signalling value of rejoining the programmes; the practical support provided by Stonewall; whether UCL needed an external charter mark in respect of its approach to LGBTQ+ equality; whether the differing positions taken by members of UCL to self-identification and the sex/gender distinction prevented UCL from aligning itself with an organisation promoting a particular approach; whether membership of the programme or submission to the equality index impacted UCL’s ability to uphold academic freedom or freedom of expression; and whether UCL should subscribe to programmes and submit to an evaluation scheme that are politically and ideologically contested.

17.4 Stonewall was widely-respected for its contribution to the transformation of UK law and policy in relation to same-sex sexuality since its foundation in 1989. In 2015 Stonewall extended its remit to work on trans rights. Elements of its approach since that time had been controversial, particularly in respect of perceived tensions between trans rights and women’s existing sex-based rights. In recent months a number of public bodies had withdrawn from the Diversity Champions Programme.

17.5 Two groups of members had written to the Board and these letters had been circulated with the paper. A member of each group was invited to speak to their position.

17.6 Those who wrote in opposition to renewal of membership noted that Stonewall demanded a ‘no debate’ stance on its position on gender identity, vilifying those who took an opposing view on matters of gender self-identification and the legal implications of this for the right to single-sex spaces. In the view of the authors, this had serious implications for academic freedom. Stonewall’s opposition to data collection on the basis of sex, and to discussion of this position, was specifically cited. It was noted that the Reindorf Review into two incidents of ‘no-platforming’ at the University of Essex had concluded that Stonewall had misrepresented the Equality Act 2010, contributing to a climate promoting potentially unlawful actions by the university including a failure to uphold the Public Sector Equality Duty. Further, members of UCL had been no-platformed for taking positions contrary to those of Stonewall. An attempt had been made to cancel a 2020 conference on women’s rights at UCL on the grounds that it had been in contradiction to Stonewall’s Workplace Equality Index. It was argued that a renewal of UCL’s relationship with Stonewall would effectively outsource the institution’s thinking on a set of complex and contentious issues which were the subject of ongoing academic debate.

17.7 Those who had written in favour of renewal cited UCL’s distinctive history and culture of inclusion and equality, and the need to have access to the tools available through the Stonewall schemes in order to protect and advance the equalities of LGBTQ+ people. Stonewall’s guidance was educative and advisory, and so did not prohibit any institution from hosting gender-critical speakers; freedom of speech was protected by the Human Rights Act 1998 and by UCL’s own codes of conduct. It was for institutions to decide how and whether to reflect Stonewall guidance in their culture and practice. Much of the criticism of Stonewall in the current debate was not in fact of Stonewall itself, but of individuals acting on their own behalf.

17.8 Members were invited to speak to the issue, alternating between speakers on either side of the debate.
17.9 Points made by members speaking in opposition to rejoining the schemes included the following:

- Stonewall had an explicit ‘no debate’ stance which did not accept that legitimate differences of opinion existed in the space in which gender self-identification came into conflict with the interests of women. Rather, they framed the debate as one about the right of trans people to exist, and characterised those who opposed their approach as transphobic. Comments made by the current Chief Executive of Stonewall were cited in this respect.

- Stonewall was an important charity working on inclusion, but there were other organisations with different views. Inclusion needed to take account of all protected characteristics, including religion. Fundamentally the issue was one of competing claims of rights when different protected characteristics came into conflict. Stonewall’s approach did not reflect the fact that the terms are contested, including by LGBTQ+ people themselves.

- UCL should function as a forum in which debate takes place and should not submit to assessment on the extent of its compliance with the values of an external body explicitly on one side of the debate. It was antithetical to a commitment to debate and enquiry, and to the concept of ‘disagreeing well’, for UCL to ally itself with a lobby group which took the approach of silencing debate in general, and disproportionately the voices of women in particular. Acknowledging UCL’s history in respect of issues of equality, members suggested that this presented evidence of the importance of the institution taking an independent stance. UCL should seek to draw on the breadth and depth of expertise among its own staff in seeking to formulate its own approach to such issues.

- The fact that the 2020 conference had gone ahead should not be taken as an indication that Stonewall did not present a challenge to free speech. The conference organisers had complied with the Code of Practice on Freedom of Speech but this had not been seen as sufficient by those who sought to have the event cancelled. This kind of approach was likely to discourage the organisation of similar events in the future.

- The Reindorff Review had found University of Essex policy, which had been reviewed by Stonewall, to have misrepresented the law and to have instead described the law as Stonewall would have preferred it to be. The report found that the university appeared to have been given the impression that gender-critical academics could legitimately be excluded from the institution. Until Stonewall acknowledged such mistakes and took steps to avoid making them again in the future, UCL ought not to work with them.

- Academic Board had voted in favour of finding an alternative to the IHRA definition of antisemitism because of concerns that the definition’s imperfections would inhibit free speech [AB Minute 25, 2020-21]. Noting the concerns expressed about how a decision not to renew in this case would be perceived, it was suggested that it would be inconsistent to prioritise concerns over the messaging in this case.
17.10 Points made by members speaking in support of rejoining the schemes included the following:

- Stonewall provided access to the best advice and the ability to benchmark against other employers, against which UCL could then decide whether to change policy and practice. Members cited a number of advances at UCL in recent years which had been made under the auspices of Stonewall schemes or in response to Stonewall training. Experience suggested that such schemes, whatever their flaws, were crucial drivers for positive and progressive change. If re-engagement with Stonewall was the most effective way of pursuing the legal duty to eliminate discrimination against LGBTQ+ people, then that is what should be done.
- Stonewall provided advice; there was no compulsion on a university to agree with or to follow it. Any attempt to no-platform individuals on the basis of Stonewall guidance represented a misunderstanding of that advice.
- If there was evidence of academic freedom being harmed by rejoining either programme or the workplace index, then UCL would need to decide how to address that as a separate issue, as well as providing support to the members of staff affected.
- UCL’s membership of the schemes had lapsed in 2020 on a temporary basis in view of the unusual conditions at the time. Many members of the university had been unaware that UCL’s membership had not been renewed. The EDI team was now adequately resourced and the LGBTQ+ Equality Steering Group had voted to rejoin.
- No viable alternative to rejoining the Stonewall schemes had been identified in the papers or in the current discussion. The provision of a UCL-specific alternative was likely to be very resource-intensive.
- While this discussion was specifically about re-joining Stonewall schemes, the underlying subject was the lives of a marginalised group of people, the extent of whose representation in the current debate was unclear. Rejoining would help UCL to move forward to supporting LGBTQ+ people. A decision not to rejoin risked sending the message internally that UCL was unsupportive of these colleagues, and of creating an external perception that the decision was further evidence of a global reaction against the unfinished social revolution that had brought about the advances in equalities and freedoms in recent decades.

17.11 Members were invited to vote, using Zoom’s anonymous poll feature, on the two principal questions set out in the paper. The view of Academic Board, which would be relayed to UMC, was as follows:

Should UCL re-join the Stonewall Diversity Champions Programme and the Stonewall Global Diversity Champions Programme?
