Provost’s View: Demonstrating how we are a force for the public good

It is fundamentally important to the future of our country that our universities remain internationally competitive. To do that they need to remain well funded and autonomous.

But is this message getting through?

We need to go further and engage better with the relevant communities and stakeholders, to raise awareness about our research activity, and why it’s a good idea to have world-class universities in their midst.

The more diverse the communities that we listen to and audiences that we engage with, the more UCL will thrive.
